Dentistry.

NEELANDS & BRO., Graduates of Royal College of Dental Surgeons, Ontario.

DENTISTS — DENTISTS

The People's Dental Instructor.

A book showing how teeth may be preserved to old age. This little book is a treatise on the teeth (natural and artificial), written by J. Neelands, L.D.S., sent to any address for 15 cents. Given to patients free at his office. The great success Dr. Neelands has attained in the introduction of Nitrous Oxide Gas, by the Messrs. NEELANDS for the painless extraction of teeth is such that in the year of 1876 over 1,000 persons received gas given to thousands of persons and on no occasion have they failed, and had to resort to the use of Chloroform or Ether. Dr. Neelands has made a special study of this gas under Dr. Colton, of New York, the originator of the use of it for extracting teeth, who states in a letter lately received by J. Neelands, that he has now given the gas to about 95,000 persons, without an accident or failure.

Artificial teeth inserted of matchless beauty and perfection. After having experimented for several years with the various modes of retaining artificial teeth firmly in the spongy mouths, we have succeeded in perfecting an Atmospheric disk, which is successfully in every case. Patients from a distance will please call early in the day and secure an appointment. Office—next to S. & O. Bigelow's store. Don't forget the place. J. NEELANDS, L. D. S. JAS. S. NEELANDS, L. D. S.

A CHRISTMAS CAROL.

"Try to become little with the Little One, that you may increase in stature with Him."—St. Bonaventure.

Little Star, so pure and bright,
Shining through the startled night,
Whither dost thou lead the way
Shining so far to perfect day?
'Christ is little, learn to be
Meek and pure and bright as He,
Thus His secrets ye shall know
In His Father's grace to grow.'

Little lamb, so fairly white,
Where the watchers of thy night?
Fearest thou not the beasts of prey
Now thy shepherds are away?
'They are gone, lost Christ is nigh,
Christ, young and pure as I,
While they kneel around His bed
He is watching at my head.'

Little flower, thy day is done,
Thou art withered in the sun,
Could'st not live another day?
Christ with thee would gladly play,
'That were joy, but shorter days
Bring a richer meed of praise,
Now I breathe my life away
In His manger with the hay.'

Little thought, so rain and weak,
Dar'st thou of thy Lord to speak!
Wouldst thou bring Him of thine own,
Lay thyself before His throne?
'Yes, for He is little too,
And can tell what small things do,
To His stable I will go,
Hoping soon with Him to grow.'

COMIN' THRO' THE RYE.

A NOVEL.

"Had we never met see kindly,
Had we never loved sae blindly,
Never met and never parted,
We had ne'er been broken-hearted."

SEED TIME.

I wonder why people always feel so much more hungry on Sundays than any other day? Is it the sermon, or is it because we have kept our mouths shut so long that we have not taken in enough air? Anyway, we settle to our dinner in earnest, and there is a long, satisfied silence. I come to the surface first and glance around me, thinking how very like animals we all look, though we do use knives and forks and dinner-napkins.

Mrs. Skipworth looks uneasy; her dress certainly is tighter than it was in the drawing-room. Surely there will be an explosion soon. There it is! She lays down her knife and fork, gives a mighty sneeze—a loud crack, as of hooks and eyes being violently divorced, is heard, then she settles herself in her chair and looks relieved. It is very strange, but there is no gaping fissure visible in front, therefore there must surely be something left. Jack sees, too, as he leans back, has no speculation in his eye, and he does not offer to fetch a shawl to hide her ruins, so it can't be there. It is certainly very mysterious. How delightful it is to sit still and to know that we shall not be called upon to provide conversation; for, of all the hard tasks the governor sets us, that is the hardest. When we were small children we were ordered to be silent, and bade never to open our lips in his presence. We never went to him in any of our childish joys or troubles, he took no interest in us; and why, we would have loved him if he had let us, came to have no feeling for him save that of fear. Now, that we are growing up, we are not afraid of him; but the old restraint lingers, and we sit and upon his bidding us to talk, lo! we find that the fountain is dry, and the harder we pump the less water we bring, and it is the daily puzzle of our lives to find "something to say," or to hit upon some safe subject concerning which we may furbish up a few remarks. We are not afraid him; but, nevertheless, it is a degrading and mortifying fact that, whereas, behind his back, we are bold as lions, before his face we are meek as lambs, while our voices remain obstinately in our boots. If our lives depended on it we could not give one such whoop in his presence as we utter a hundred times a day when he is out of ear-shot.

The butler and footman hurry hither and thither, executing promptu slides in their flights across-country, that move us to admiration; but woe betide them if, in their slavish haste, they clink one plate against another, or fail to appear at papa's elbow, vegetable or sauce-dish, the very moment he is ready for a fresh supply!—while, as to the dishes, if, as soon as one disappears, another does not instantly take its place, his face becomes such a study of scorn and disgust as any living being might seek in vain to imitate. We all sit round and watch him with a never-ending amazement not unmixed with admiration, and wonder how on earth he does it. His face seems to be made of India-rubber, and takes every inflection and shade of ill-temper and uncharitableness. I believe if we watched him till doomsday we should see some fresh contortion every day. He does not confine himself to looks, though—he acts. A dish-cover falls, and he becomes a shuttlecock that the battledore of his wrath may send into the grate, or out of the window, or after James's rapidly-vanishing calves; it is impossible to tell where, we can only watch his eye and speculate as to the probable direction it will take.

To-day, however, there are no such compliments flying; and, if Mr. Skipworth does now and then interpose a diabolical look intended for Simpkins, what then? He is used to the governor's little ways. And now dessert is on the table, and papa is telling us he never end gentleman yet occasionally hunted on a cob as fat as himself a pleasing little anecdote about a parson who came to grief last winter in —shire. Taking an awkward jump, he rolled off his horse into a pond, from which he piteously besought a passing squire to extricate him.

"No, no!" cried the squire, dashing his rowels into his horse's sides, "lie where you are! You won't be wanted till next Sunday!"

Mr. Skipworth, who, in his travels across-country, has explored every pond, ditch, and brook for ten miles around, utters a feeble "Ha, ha, ha!" at which the governor, who is one of the pluckiest and hardiest riders in the country, chuckles unkindly. Blessed hunting that in winter takes him from the bosom of his family twice a week; and oh! long-tarrying first of September, when will you come and set his feet among the stubble! We are eating strawberries, which, to my fancy, always smell and look so much better than they taste. A jerk of papa's thumb presently dismisses us with our mouths half filled, and we walk decorously past his chair, but, once outside the door, scamper away like the wind to vent the spirits that have been so tightly bottled up for the last two hours. We all go our different ways—Alice and Milly to stroll about the garden, Dolly and Alan to some mysterious haunt known only to themselves, Jack and I to our birds and beasts. They are a rascally lot, consisting of the lame, the halt, the blind, and in any eyes but ours would not be worth a pinch of snuff. We have a dog without a tail, a canary without an eye, a raven without a leg, a crippled rabbit, and various other poor wretches who have been compelled by the force of circumstances to part with one or another of their natural appendages.

Papa is safe for another two hours. He and Skippy will tell tales one against the other that would best Munchausen in the art, and burst green with envy; so we let out the rabbits, the parrot, and the raven, and they follow behind as we take our way through the garden and paddock into the orchard.

"Don't you feel rather patriarchal, Jack," I asked, looking over my shoulder to see that the rabbits are not nibbling at the poor raven, "like Noah?"

"No, I don't say I do," says Jack. "How he would grin if he could hear you comparing our measly little menagerie to his! Why, he had thousands of them!"

"So he had," I say, considering; "and how they all managed in the ark I cannot imagine. They went in two-and-two, but of course they all had families; and, if there was only just room at first, they must have found it a tight fit after a bit."

"Very," said Jack, absently. "I say, Nell, will you get up early to-morrow morning?"

"I don't know," I answer, doubtfully. "You don't want me to go fishing, do you?"

"On such occasions I enjoy the proud distinction of firing crawling, wriggling worms on the hooks, while he has all the honor and glory of the undertaking, and eats the fish afterwards."

"No, you little silly, I'm not. It is something much
