CHRISTMAS TREE.

The oak is a strong and stalwart tree,
And lifts its branches up,
And catches the dew right gallantly
In many a dainty cup.
And the world is brighter, and better made,
Because of the woodman's stroke,
Descending in ease, or falling in shade,
On the sturdy form of the oak.

But stronger, I ween, in apparel green,
And trapping so fair to see,
With its precious freight, for small and great,
Is the beautiful Christmas tree.

The elm is a kind and goodly tree,
With its branches bending low;
The heart is glad when its form we see,
As we list to the river's flow.
Ay! the heart is glad, and the pulses bound,
And joy illumines the face,
Whenever a goodly elm is found,
Because of its beauty and grace.
But kindlier I ween, more goodly in mien,
With branches more drooping and free,
The twice of whose leaves, fidelity weaves,
Is the beautiful Christmas tree.

The maple is supple, and lithe and strong,
And clamoth our love anew
When the days are listless, and quiet and long,
And the world is fair to view.
And later, as beauties and graces unfold
A monarch right regally dress,
With dreamers dyes and pennons of gold,
Is seemeth of all the best.
More lovely, I ween, the brightness and sheen,
And the coloring, sunny and free,
And the banners gay, that are held aloft,
By the beautiful Christmas tree.

COMIN' THRO' THE RYE.

warning that painful experience has taught me and Jack, when whirr! whiff! the top of the table flies to the end of the room, shooting Dolly into the fire-place, and Alan dances up and down, as though the perils he loes have just escaped make him anxious to assure himself of their integrity.

Piteous whimpers and groans from the fire place announce extensive and painful damages to the poor little maid who was riding aloft so triumphantly a minute ago. Bruises and tears are, however, alike merged in the all-absorbing question of how the table is to be joined together again. In the middle of the room its legs stand stark and bare, like a thin little man, from whom his ample and overflowing spouse has departed.

All this while they have not been aware of my presence on the scene, but now as I remark, "A very pretty amusement, certainly!" with all the gravity and weight my thirteen years entitle me to display, they hail me joyfully, and with my assistance, and much pulling and straining, the divorced parts are put together, and Dolly has time to bewail her misfortunes, and Alan to rub his unharmed shins responsive.

Pursuing my prowl, I wander round the irregularly built, three sided court and am shortly awakened from my abstraction by hearing a door bang violently.

Have you ever lived in a house, reader, where the merest chance sound the bang of a door, the sound of a loud voice, or a distant noise, makes you start up, your nerves tingling, your heart beating, your body trembling, while an instantaneous photograph of falling chairs, flying crockery, broken bell ropes, and dancing chins, with a devish dancing in the midst of the confusion, presents itself vividly to your eyes?

All this I see when that distant bang reaches my ears. To-day it means "Bills." It is an insult to papa's understanding for any one to dare ask for his money. We must be clothed, it is true, and fed, but shall the paying for those small trifles be taken as a legitimate, every day duty? Perish the thought! It is disgraceful, it is unseemly, it is an upside-downness of everything, that these rascals should, week after week, be sending their paltry bits of blue paper in to him, and he resents the impertinence accordingly. Ah, poor mother! You are in the midst of that hurly burly yonder, when I am older I will walk straight in and share it with you, now I should be ordered out. Experience tells me that the sooner I hide myself the better, for when pops is in one of those furies there is no safety for any one from garret to coal cellar, in this mood he may even feel that a slaughter of the innocents is necessary for the rehabilitation of his peace of mind, so I hastily retire to the rabbit hutch, which is in a central position, and then watch the march of events. From my coign of vantage I presently see him come out, and throw his eyes hither and thither in search of prey, then he goes down through the garden and out of sight. I am just thinking that perhaps the house will be safer than my present quarters, when in the distance I see dogs, fowls, fry, nurses, Amberley, Jack, Alice, Milly, and Dolly, all flying toward the house, like autumn leaves before the wind. No need to ask what is behind them, only one person on earth could have that effect, so, remembering that there is safety in numbers, I join the flying squadron and reach the house with the rest. As we enter by the side-door, the rusty front door bell is smartly pulled by a business-looking man in black, at whom we all peep privily from convenient lattices, and make up our mind that Providence sent him straight from heaven to be our deliverer. He has come to see papa, we ascertain later, and is even now closeted with him. I wonder how he will manage to so far smooth his ruffled plumes as to carry on any conversation that is not strictly vituperative?

We are all sitting together, save Jack, when we hear his steps coming down the passage, and he enters and closes the door with a cheerful bang, that does not make us all bound on our seats as the bangs of a certain other person do. There is a peculiar look on Jack's face, a kind of knowing twinkle in his eye, a modest elation in his glance, that owes its origin, I am certain, to some bit of news that he has possessed himself of, and which he is secretly enjoying in its full relish before imparting it to us.

"News!" we all cry, starting from our seats, "surely he cannot cannot be going away?"

Oh! those two delicious words, can any others in the whole dictionary contain such sweet music!

"I say," says Jack, vigorously repulsing the avalanche of female arms that threaten to overwhelm him, "I can't tell you anything, can I, if you stifle me?"

"Go on! go on!" we all cry, withdrawing hastily from the oracle.

"Well," says Jack, complacently surveying the row of open eyes, mouths, and ears, "he is going away (shouts of delight); he is going to-morrow (fresh rejoicings); and he is coming back next day (howls of dissatisfaction). Nevertheless, there is one saving circumstance, he is going early, so we shall have one clear day in which to accomplish our deeds of darkness."

"Hurrah! I know what I shall do."

"You'll take me with you," I say imploringly, "do."

"Can't," says Jack, briefly, "I shall go out shooting."

We all gasp; Jack with a gun in his hands. Oh, if the governor could but.

"What are you going to shoot?" asks Alice with interest.

"Blackbirds."

"Yourself, you mean," I say, nodding and feeling much hurt, and somewhat spiteful that I may not go with him to see the fun. "Only if you do, you must do it thoroughly, the governor hates sickness, you know; and, if you did have a bad accident, how you would catch it."

"Funerals are expensive," says Alice. "On the whole I think papa would rather he only crippled himself."

"I shall take his new gun," says Jack, pursuing his own train of thought, and paying no head to our cackle, "it's sure not to burst."

"I shall make treacle-tarts," I say, feeling my absence very keenly, and wondering if Jack will relent. (I could make myself useful in picking the birds up.)

"What are you going to do now, Alice?"

"I don't know," she says, turning a lovely, thoughtful face upon me, "there is so little mischief girls can get into. I think I shall make Amberley take me into Pimpernel,' and I will have my photograph taken; it has never been done yet, you know."

"Whatever do you want a likeness for?" asks Jack, opening his eyes; "can't you look at your face in the glass fifty times a day if you like? And there's nobody to give it to, for we haven't a friend in the world, and you wouldn't give one to us surely?"

But Alice does not answer, she is wondering what the sun will make of her face of which—

"'Tis beauty truly blest, where red and white Nature's own sweet and cunning hand laid on."

"I shall go with Alice," says Milly, promptly.

"And I," says Alan, the solemn-faced, "shall look over papa's new edition of the "Ingoldsby Legends;" I've had one or two peeps at it already."

"What are you going to do, Dolly?"

"I shall take two Seidlits powders with sugar, you know. They are so nice, and nurse says they make me thinner. I am never able to take them when papa is at home, because they make me look pale."

"Bravo, Dolly!" cries Jack, "happy the mind that a little contents. Well, girls, you shall have a fine dish of blackbirds for supper, and Nell's treacle-tarts, if they are eatable."

"Will you?" cries a terrible voice behind us, that galvanizes our recumbent forms into most intense and rigid uprightness, while every soft hair on our miserable young heads stands on end with freezing, curdling horror—"will you? I'll teach you, miss (with a fierce nod at Alice's pretty, trembling figure), to go gallivanting off to Pimpernel, to simper at a low photographer, you miserable, doll-faced, conceited puppet; (to Jack) I'll teach you, sir, to use my guns and bring me in a doctor's bill a yard long for mending your wretched bones; (to me) I'll teach you, you object, to waste my substance with your filthy treacle-tarts; and you, sir (to Alan), to maul over my books, while as to you (to Dolly), although I can't offer you Seidlits powders, perhaps brimstone and treacle will do as well, co—co—co—ook. You deceitful, vagabond, shameless pack, get out of my sight; go!"

He need not tell us that twice, away we flee, every man for himself, and devil take the hindmost; along the passage, up the stairs, in at the nursery, to which we always flee on these occasions, for mother is nearly always there. At our heads comes the governor, and a lively time follows; we become a prose version of that deplorable story of ten little niggers, which we all know; as rapidly as they dropped off, so do we; this one for a cane, that for a Bible, another into space with boxed ears, until from beginning with a goodly number we end a forlorn remnant. Over and above our other punishments we are one and all sent to bed, and thither, when he has stormed himself away, we retire, only too thankful to have that refuge to sneak into. Anything is bearable while we are together, the only real misery he could inflict upon us would be to commit us all to solitary confinement. Jack comes in by-and-by, and sits down on the edge of Alice and Milly's bed, while I perch myself on a chair hard by.

THE HESSIAN FLY.

[London Advertiser.]

A correspondent of the Country Gentleman finds the source of this insect's devastations, where so much agricultural trouble is found, namely, in the poverty of the soil. He says: "The Hessian fly is a real evil; but the fact that it does serious damage shows that something else is wrong. Its injuries are attributed to early sowing. But why do farmers sow too early? Only for this: to gain by longer time the growth which the wheat plant needs to protect it through the winter. In other words, on land too poor for a good crop of wheat, farmers sow wheat and get it in very early, so as to have a better chance. If our wheat fields were as fertile as they should be, the 25th of September would be early enough to sow, and in a warm fall like the present, seeding could be continued till the first week in October. Trace the diseases and enemies of plants or animals to their source and we usually find defective nutrition at the bottom of the difficulty." This writer does not apprehend any permanent danger from this pest. Farmers will hereafter sow less wheat, be more careful about preparing the ground, and choosing the time of sowing, and probably raise larger crops than ever before. This fall has been exceptionally favorable to the ravages of the Hessian fly, owing to the warm and growing weather that succeeded sowing. There was no killing frost until near November, nor frost of any kind until the middle of October. With frosts at the usual time, and not sowing too early, this evil may be counteracted. It is the poverty of the soil which leads farmers year by year to sow their wheat earlier in order to get a strong growth before winter sets in. Making the soil richer removes the difficulty, by obviating its original and principal cause. It never pays to attempt to grow fall wheat on a meagre soil.
