AS A LITTLE CHILD.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

Of such is the kingdom! Teach them so,
O Master most loving,
To feel the deep significance
Of these dear words of thine!

The haughty feet of power shall fall
Where meekness quietly goes;
No opening find the key of heaven,
No strength the gates unclose

Alone to guiltlessness and love
Those gates shall open fall;
The man of pride is nothingness,
The child-like heart is all.

COMIN' THRO THE RYE.

A child in the youth of primy nature;
Forward and permanent, sweet not lasting;
The perfume and suppliance of a minute;
No more.

say, "If I were you I would not have quite so many, dear; there will be such a row when papa comes!" Alice laughs, blushes, and is about to answer, when mother comes in, and no more is said.

We go out donkey riding this afternoon, everybody except Jack, who is too proud. A small drove of asses has been chartered for the occasion, and at the appointed hour they stand at the dove cote and stubborn, each provided with a small boy, whose duty it is to "whip up" the aforesaid beast and make it "go." Amberley's charge staggers ominously as she mounts him; and, when seated, her long legs touch the ground, but she would rather die than be left behind, or prove unequal to the emergency, so she hitches them up and leads the van with some dignity, and, I think, much disconfort. Alice has the best beast; it has broad back with a fat body, and she sits on it at her ease, shaded by her cool straw hat, under which her face takes no yellow reflections as does mine, looking as the Queen of Sheba may have looked in her young and palmy days. Mother has insisted on our taking two or three of the fey, strong backed, stout-limbed boys, of whom there is an endless succession after Dolly, so we make a goodly cavalcade as we jog away with our attendant grooms.

Now there are few things pleasanter than to ride along the Devonshire lanes in summer time on a well-groomed, broad-backed, peaceable donkey; one is not at the trouble of walking, nor yet at the trouble of riding; one can just amble along at leisure, enjoying the air, the sky, and the light that quivers on the path through boughs that meet coyly overhead. There is a dreamy sensation of utter rest as one wanders in and out of the tangle of lanes that seem to have no beginning and no ending, but to indulge this feeling, the boy with the stick, whose wheels, regular as the flail on a threshing floor, fall upon your animal's hide, must be left behind; there is little romance in these darkly shaded, flower starred lanes to the tune of such music. We have a few mishaps by the way. Amberly is painfully thin, so is her beast, and their bones do not agree, so every now and then she slips noiselessly over his head and slides into the ditch or dusty road. We get used to it after a bit, so does she, and takes it as a matter of course. Dolly's steed walks into a turnstile and is with some difficulty disentangled. The fey have, to our great relief, long ago succeeded in goading their asses into a trot, and have vanished amid clouds of dust, closely followed by their attendant sprites, yelling with delight at the spirit their several profiges evince. At Alice's request our party of beaters have fallen behind, so we pace slowly along the dim green lanes, meeting neither man nor beast, it is all as hushed, as still, and as solitary, as an uninhabited island.

Leathfully we return homeward at last, and are met at the house door by mother with the intelligence that the governess is coming to morrow. Our general laughter ceases, we all dismount anyhow, and go in doors to sit down under the shock of the intelligence which (though we know it must arrive some time or other) comes upon us like an ice cold shower bath. We all seem to have forgotten our days of bondage during the past fortnight. Farewell dolce far niente days. We did not make half enough of you while you lasted, and now you are gone, and we shall never get any at all like you again. Farewell, social breakfasts, leisurely dinners, pleasant strolls, and general ease of body and! Farewell, donkeys, crabs, shrimps, rocks, seaweed, early walks, and natural conversation.

Now that those happy days are gone, I become aware that Jack and I did not half fill them. We might have got into so much more mischief, done so many more things, enjoyed ourselves twice as keenly. How shall we ever pull oars long together by to morrow? Morally speaking we have fallen to pieces during the last fourteen days, but all that must be seen to at once. We must put on our stays, gird up our loins, and look sharply to our manners, morals, and clothes, the very expression of our faces must be altered, and our voices be brought down a great many notes. We must get out of that loose and ridiculous habit of laughing at everything and nothing, we must smooth the gay smiles out of our faces, and be as she who has any dimples must put them away for the present. The school room must be set in order and some school books laid about to look as though they had been used, the dining room must be polished till it works again, Lance must be awakened from the sloth into which he has fallen, and the cook stirred up to punctuality; the fey must be promptly broken of the habit they have lately fallen into of tumbling down and cutting open their heads, necks, or legs; in short the whole house and all that dwell therein must be thoroughly revised, weeded, and drilled against the ordeal of that awful to morrow that is rushing upon us as fast as it can pell. It does not seem half an hour ago that mother told us the news, and, lo! the night has passed away, the morning has come and gone, one o'clock has struck, and in the distance we hear the smart click of horses' feet, and we know that behind that cheerful trot sits our unchoseful governess.

We are drawn up in well brushed, well scrubbed, solemn faced ranks in the school room. There is not one weakened smile among the whole lot. And now he is in the hall, he is kissing mother, and in another minute stands before us. Why can I not infuse into my salute that warmth and alacrity that I did on wishing him good-by on the Manor House door-step? Why, indeed! As we pass in review before him, he looks at each from head to foot; but we all pass master safely until he comes to the last of all, Alice. We know what is coming when his eye lights on a certain portion of that young woman's dress, nothing more nor less, in short than a crinoline few. The fact is Alice loves a big crinoline; papa, accustomed to the straight up and down charms of her mother and grandmother, hates it and as sure as ever her petticoats swell beyond a certain limit there is a fearful to do, and the whole house is turned upside down and out of windows. Now, Alice knows the length of tether permitted to her perfectly well, but she is under a mistaken impression that the more balloon like her skirts, the more charming her pretty form appears; and when she wants to look particularly ravishing, puts on a little more crinoline, just as a South Sea islander puts on a little more paint; and in the excitement and novelty of the Periwinkle life, she has forgotten her parent's prejudices, and stands before him confessed in all her amplitude of five yards and a half.

It is odd that she should be caught, though, for her crinoline is like some magical flower that opens and shuts, expands and contracts, according to the state of the weather, i.e., papa's temper. If he is in an amiable or engrossed mood, she usually lets out an extra roof or two; if he is in a bad one, she collapses at a moment's notice and looks like a folded butterfly; but Alice's admirers have evidently turned her down copy terry.

"You disgusting spectacle!" says papa, deliberately looking at her from top to toe. "you object! Go to your room and take that vile barrel off, and if you ever dare appear before me in it again, I'll pull it off and burn it!"

Of poor Alice, whisking a pile of books from the table in her passage to the door; she does not mean to do it, poor pretty Alice, it is only an evil trick played her by that fatal combination of wholesome and callow, but the governor thinks she does, and flies after her. Thank God, she is too old to have her ears boxed, and he soon relents, but, oh! we heartily wish we had no ears at all, as we sit for half an hour listening to his tirade against Alice, mother, Amberley, and his own evil fate in marrying to become the father of such a daughter. (It was the best thing he did in his life.)

Chapter VIII.

"If she be made of red and white,
Her faults will never be known,
For blushing cheeks by faults are hid;
And fears by pale white shown."

The clock is striking eight, and we are all hunting sauve-qui-peut for the family book of prayers. Not once since we came to Periwinkle have we looked upon its goodly face, and now it is revenging itself by refusing to come forth and save us from utter disgrace. If papa discovers that we have eaten one morning meal without the seasoning salt of chapter, prayer, and benediction, then woe, woe, woe betide us! We distractedly turn the books over and over, but nowhere does that much coveted old brown cover meet our eager gaze. Overhead we hear his war like tread as he walks to the toilet-table; he is putting on his coat, and now he has opened the door, and is telling mamma she is the laziest woman in Christendom, and a disgrace to her sex; his foot is on the stair, oh! o-o-oh! We tumble madly over each other in a dancing agony, and a pale tear trickles down Amberley's nose, when, hallelujah! I have found it, wedged in with its back to the wall, between the "Arabian Nights" and the "Pilgrim's Progress." We are saved by the skin of our teeth, and fly to our seats with thankful hearts while Alice finds the place, and sets the old marker, "Jesus wept," with its back broken in three places on the open page. He is in the room before she has done, and having received our morning salutes, and glanced sharply at Alice's collapsed charms (she looks like Samson shorn of his strength), rings the bell for prayers. He is half through the chapter before the servants can get in at the door, but that is of little consequence, they would not hear a word if they were present. Breakfast passes over better than might be expected. There are so many safe remarks we can make about Periwinkle; every man and woman we see is not an enemy, the mention of whose name must be shunned as the plague; and I am even able to provoke a smile by remarking that it is difficult to hear the sermon on Sunday evening because the sailors snore so loudly.

I think that if we were to travel much we should find plenty to talk to him about; become quite colloquial, in fact. Ah! travel's a wonderful thing for enlarging the mind; No wonder splendid Will said, "Home-keeping youths have ever homely wits" (of course he meant that for girls as well).

Every dog has its day, but every cat its night.

Mr. Agassiz says that in certain Amazonian tribes, on the day of his marriage, while the wedding festivities are going on, the bridegroom's hands are tied up in a paper bag with fire ants. If he bears the torture smilingly and unmoved, he is considered fit for the trials of matrimony.

"Brother Smith," said a doleful looking individual, "my mind is in a very unsettled state. I don't know but I have had a call to preach." "Oh, never mind," said that sympathising brother, "I wouldn't worry about it, if I was in your place, for like enough you won't hear it ag'in this forty year."

Love is seldom lost in this world, for if it be not sown in a fertile field where it may grow up a blessing, it purifies and chastens the heart that gives it birth. But, though a cloud of doubt often obscures the bright shining we may be positively certain that none is lost between two women who speak of each other as "that person."

Logic is very simple when properly explained. Thus the premises of a proposition are that you have a door with a keyhole in it and prompted by fancy you blow pepper through it with the bellows. If the next day the servant appears with her eye in a bandage, the inference is she was peeping into the room at an unfortunate moment.

REMEMBER THIS.

Now is the time of your Pneumonia, Lung Fever, Coughs, Colds, and fatal results of predisposition to Consumption and other Throat and Lung Diseases. Hagyard's Yellow Syrup has been used in this neighborhood for the past two or three years without a single failure to cure. If you have not used this medicine yourself go to your Druggist, S. Fenner, Kent-st., Lindsay, and ask him of its wonderful success among his customers. Three doses will relieve the worst case. If you have no faith in any medicine just buy a sample bottle of Hagyard's Yellow Syrup for 10 cts., and try it. Regular size bottle, 75 cents. Don't neglect a cough to save 75 cents. 954-now.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

Epps's Cocoa. Grateful and Comforting. "By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating round us ready to attack whenever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame." Civil Service Gazette. Sold only in packets labelled James Epps & Co., Homœopathic Chemists, 48, Threadneedle-street, and 170, Piccadilly, London." 799-1y.
