John Bull and his Son Sam.

Said old John Bull to his son Sam:
"You are my eldest lad,
And would I am to see you, Sam,
Take pattern from your dad.

Now don't begin to frown, Sam,
Like many another youth,
Or grumble at your dad, Sam,
For telling you the truth.

You know as well as I, Sam,
We both love power and pelf,
But when you talk your dad, Sam,
And set up for yourself.

You had a fine open theory, Sam,
To justify your way;
But what you call was true, Sam,
You swore a lie to-day.

First take your Declaration, Sam;
You tread the whole with scorn,
Except where it declares, Sam,
All men are equal born.

And that you swore a lie, Sam,
For eighty years at least,
Made slaves of your black equal, Sam,
And sold him like a beast.

I recollect the time, Sam,
When you were wont to call
Your dad an Abolitionist,
And cursed at Exeter Hall.

But when, in sixty-one, Sam,
You got into a fix,
You did as your old dad did, Sam,
In eighteen thirty-six.

Both of us freed our slaves, Sam,
Both in a different way;
Yours is quite your brothers friend,
While I freed mine for pay.

Again, I will remember, Sam,
When you were very young,
You swore occasion light, Sam,
And I swore it was wrong.

But when the thing came home, Sam,
Soon you swore it lark,
And did the very thing, Sam,
For which you blamed your dad!

There is another thing, Sam,
At which I often wink,
That was to hear you hoist, Sam,
If rebel you were styled.

It might have hurt your feelings, Sam,
I candidly must say,
But now you love the word so well,
You use it every day.

Oft I have heard you swear, Sam,
Taxation was a curse,
And that a national debt was
A monster ten times worse.

I am not going to say, Sam,
You did not tell the truth;
But how is it to-day, Sam?
You glory in both.

I own that in the franchise, Sam,
You are ahead of me;
Of course, where colored men guard the polls
Rebellion never an raise!

I have not got to that, Sam,
Nor can I tell as yet,
How the worst men you have, Sam,
The best positions get.

But now a word or two, Sam,
Concerning all the chance
That you are daily making, Sam,
About the Alabama.

Now, tell the truth for once, Sam,
Though it should make you sick:
How many times have you, Sam,
Been guilty of the trick?

I do not say it's wrong, Sam,
Nor blame you for the act;
But Cuba, and Fenian, Sam,
Corroborate the fact.

In fact, I want to know, Sam,
Did you ever deny
To sell to any one, Sam,
Who had the cash to buy?

From promises to pay, Sam,
Coal oil, or penny dips,
To wooden hams and nutmegs,
Clocks' cannon, chea pegs, ships!

And has there a rebellion, Sam,
These fifty years been known,
You have not praised and prided, Sam,
Unless it was your own?

You say I took advantage, Sam—
However that may be—
But did you ever fall, Sam,
To do the same with me?

From the very day you left me, Sam,
When'er my hands were full,
You never failed to cry, Sam,
Now down with Johnny Bull!

But very well I know, Sam,
You have a longing way,
And love to place the reigns, Sam,
Before election day.

We both might live in peace, Sam,
And better our conditions,
If both of us would hang, Sam,
The meddling politicians.

Both have done some wrong, Sam,
And both should have redress:
But let us look at home, Sam,
And talk a little less!

A Tragical Bridal Tour.

BINGHAMPTON, N. Y., Nov. 1, 1875.—A most distressing drowning accident occurred in the Susquehanna River at Unadilla on Thursday last, four persons meeting their death, including the bride and groom, who were on their wedding tour. The particulars of the catastrophe are as follows:—

Maurice and William Goodrich, of Worcester, N. Y., were married to sisters in that village about a week ago. They were on their way home from their bridal tour, and stopped at Unadilla to visit the family of Mr. Joseph Moorehouse, a miller, whose wife was a sister of the brides. On Thursday the bridal party and Mr. and Mrs. Moorehouse went out boating on the river. A movement of some one of the party caused the boat to careen to one side, when the ladies sprung in fright to the other side of the boat. This sudden movement caused the very catastrophe it was intended to avert, and the boat was capsized, throwing the entire party into the water, which is very deep at that spot. Mr. Moorehouse, being an old miller and an excellent swimmer, at once seized his wife and Mrs. Maurice Goodrich, and would undoubtedly have succeeded in saving them had they not lost all presence of mind. As it was, the ladies seized their arms about Mr. Moorehouse, and he was not unable to give them any assistance, but was himself dragged to the bottom and the three were drowned together. Maurice Goodrich, being encumbered with a heavy overcoat, sank in a short time and shared the fate of the other two. William Goodrich had removed his overcoat and coat, having been rowing the boat. He was a good swimmer, and at once seized his wife as she appeared on the surface, and by pushing her ahead of him, and repeatedly lifting her from the water, succeeded in reaching the shore with her. She grasped hold of a clump of bushes and supported herself, while her husband swam rapidly back to render aid to the others if possible. It was too late, however, as they had all disappeared beneath the surface.

The news of the shocking tragedy spread rapidly through the village, and hundreds of people turned out to search for the bodies of the drowned persons. Those of Mr. Goodrich and Mr. and Mrs. Moorehouse were found the same day near where they sank. The body of Mrs. Goodrich was not recovered at last accounts. It is feared that the rescued bride, Mrs. William Goodrich, will become insane over the death of her sisters. The two young ladies were twins, as were the Goodrich brothers. Mr. and Mrs. Moorehouse leave several children. The tragic affair has cast a great gloom over the community where it occurred.
