THE FIRST AND ONLY.

Sergeant-at-Arms Glackmeyer of Ontario House Started In 1867.

"My commission," said Mr. F. J. Glackmeyer, the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Ontario Legislature, in the course of a chat with a reporter recently, "is dated 1867, the year of Confederation, when Provincial Legislatures, as we know them to-day, were organized. John Sandfield Macdonald was Premier and Attorney-General, with the Hon. John (afterwards Sir John) Carling as Minister of Agriculture and Public Works. It was through the latter that I was appointed. Born in Montreal, I had been living in London, Ont., where Sir John Carling resided, for some twelve years, and knew him well. When it became necessary to appoint the Sergeant-at-Arms he nominated me. I was 24 years old at the time, and I had no conception of what the office or its duties meant."

"Sir John Carling sent for me," proceeded Mr. Glackmeyer, with a reminiscent smile, "on the 22nd of December, 1867. The next day we went to Toronto together, and saw the Premier, who said I looked strong enough for the job, and on the 24th I got measured for my uniform in the morning, and went back to London with Sir John in the afternoon, to spend Christmas. He told me I must have a sword, so I borrowed one from Col. Macbeth, who then commanded the seventh regiment. I shall not soon forget Sir John's consternation when he saw that I proposed to wear a big military sword with a brass scabbard. I finally borrowed the sheriff's sword, and wore it with my new uniform at the opening of the House on the 27th."

Mr. Glackmeyer has seen six Premiers during the forty-seven years he has held his post—he has held it longer than any living Sergeant-at-Arms in the British Empire has. He speaks warmly of the fine speaking of the Hon. Edward Blake, who replaced Sandfield Macdonald as Premier, on the latter's defeat at the general election four and a half years after he had formed his Government. And he also mentions the Hon. E. B. Wood, Provincial Treasurer in the Sandfield Macdonald Administration, who was known as "Big Thunder," as being a remarkably fine speaker. He has known ten Lieutenant-Governors, the first of whom, Maj.-General H. W. Stisted, held office for only one year. The present Speaker is the thirteenth occupant of the chair since his appointment. One of these, the Hon. R. W. Scott, was Speaker for only two weeks, and then became a member of the Government. Another Speaker, the Hon. W. D. Balfour, was elected in February, 1895, and took office in the summer of the year following as Provincial Treasurer. Yet another, the Hon. W. A. Charlton, was elected in 1903, and resigned, after a comparatively short time, to become Minister of Public Works in the Ross Government.

"When I was first appointed," said Mr. Glackmeyer, "the House met in the old building on Front street. This was quite unsuitable. It was inconvenient, and had gone to wrack and ruin, having been used as a barracks. The first session in the present Parliament Building was opened in the spring of 1893. There were only 82 members when I was appointed, as against a hundred and six to-day. The longest session of which I have had experience — the first of the tenth Parliament — lasted 110 days. The shortest—that in 1874—lasted only forty days."

Saved By His Mitts.

A moving tale comes from the woods, a story quite worthy of Fenimore Cooper. An Indian of one of the Ontario reserves has escaped from a painful death by rather peculiar means. A few evenings ago he was walking across the ice on a small lake, when, in the darkness he stepped into one of those "air-holes" which are found in the thickest ice, and found himself plunged in deep, icy water.

James Johnson was his name — it should have been something more picturesque and hyphenated—and he was a large strong Indian and experienced in the life and misadventures of the woods. Owing to the slipperiness of the ice surrounding the hole, he was quite unable to raise himself out of the water; struggle as he might he could obtain no grip, says The Canadian Mail.

When almost exhausted he threw one arm as far over the ice as he could while he rested for a moment. When he moved again he found that the wet woollen "mitt" (fingerless glove) which he wore had frozen stiff and, fortunately for him, had also frozen tight to the glare ice on which his hand rested.

This gave him a slight grip, and, quick to seize the idea, he placed the other mitt where it would also freeze to the ice. The two frozen mitts thus gave him two hand holes, and enable him to scramble on to the ice. Then, although his clothes froze hard upon him, he managed to make his way safely home, a distance of three miles, and is none the worse for the adventure.

Not To Be Parted.

A good story is told of Mayor Goffatt of Orillia. A short time ago an Englishman not long in this country who had been laid off from work during a slack period came to the mayor for a little assistance. His worship readily granted the aid required, but at the same time suggested that the man should try for some work in the neighborhood of the town, until work in the factories picked up. "You might get work cutting wood in the bush," the mayor said. "Are you a Christian, and a believer in the Bible," quickly asked the man. "Certainly," said Mayor Goffatt. "Well, perhaps you are, but the Bible says that what God has joined together man shall not part asunder, and I'm not going to be parted from my wife."

PARKER'S TWO SERMONS.

And How He Got the Morning Congregation Back at Night.

A characteristic story of Dr. Parker was told me the other day, writes "A Man of Kent" in the British Weekly, by a minister who had it from an old minister who was much interested in Joseph Parker's early work as a local preacher. One Saturday he met Parker and asked him whether he had an engagement for Sunday. "Yes," was the reply.

"Are your sermons ready, Joseph?" asked the minister.

"I have the morning sermon," was the reply, "but I am not sure about the evening."

"Well, Joseph, what is your text for the morning and how do you treat it?"

Parker went over his text and the outline of his sermon.

"But, Joseph," said the minister, "that is very clever, but it is not the real meaning of the text. If you will look at the commentaries you will see that you are wrong."

Parker thanked him and went his way. On the Monday the minister again met his friend.

"Well, Joseph, how did you get on yesterday?"

"Very well," was the reply.

"How did you manage?"

"Well," he said, "in the morning I preached my sermon and explained the text in my way, and at the close I said: 'This is how I understand it. But learned men understand it differently, and I will tell you in the evening how the learned men understand it.'"

They all came back in the evening, and Joseph had a happy day.

MEASURING A RIVER.

How Napoleon's Engineer Found Its Width Without Instruments.

An engineer found himself summoned one day into the presence of his commander. Napoleon stood on the bank of a wide river gazing across to where the enemy had planted batteries, which he desired to attack with artillery.

"How wide is that river?" was the question put to the engineer.

"Let me get my instruments," was the reply as he turned to go for them.

"I must know at once," the emperor insisted.

The engineer went down to the level bank of the river and, standing erect, gradually bent his head forward till the edge of his hat brim just touched the line from his eyes to the water line at the opposite bank of the river. Then, keeping his head bent as it was, he wheeled a quarter turn till his eyes looked along the hat brim and met the land at a point on the same side of the river on which he stood. Here he noted a rock or tree near the point at which his eyes met the ground and, calling a soldier, directed that a stake be driven near that point as he should direct. Then, by motioning just where to drive the stake, he fixed the point at which the line from hat brim and eye reached the bank. Turning to the emperor, he said, "Your majesty, the distance from where I stand to the stake is the width of the river."

And so it was, as you can readily see. If the emperor did not promote that officer—why, then the story does not end as it should.—St. Nicholas.

TORONTO LOSING THE BUILDING THAT HOUSED EARLY BANK.

Relic of Days When Banks Were Few In Canada Goes With the Razing of the First Home of the Bank of Upper Canada — Passed Through Troubled Times and Once Withstood Sensational Crisis.

"Sold—A warehouse will be erected here." These are the words of doom written largely against the old structure at the southeast corner of King and Frederick streets. But, perhaps, it is just as well that the old landmark be removed and a new and brighter brass plate be erected to mark its grave, for scarcely any passer-by ever stops now to read the dingy old bronze sign which bids the wayfarer stop and examine. This old building was once the first bank in Toronto. More even than this; for it was the home of the first chartered bank west of the Ottawa river, says Lyman B. Jackes in The Toronto Globe.

Ninety-six years have gone by since the erection took place. In those bygone days the thick-set building occupied the most prominent corner of the town of York. Look along the south side of King street some day, between George street and Sherbourne street, and you will see the remains of a business row where once the elite of the town did their trading. What a change seven or eight decades will make! Shops that were once patronized by York's foremost society ladies in their search for dry goods and finery have degenerated into little tobacco shops. Fashionable bookshops have been replaced by little eating houses which appeared to have solved the problem of the increased cost of living. A little brass foundry has taken up its abode over the shadow of former greatness; and the bank—the institution that did so much for our forefathers—has sunk to the level of a second-hand furniture shop. So, again I say that perhaps it may be better for the old bank to give way than remain the sole object with a history in a row where everything else has been forgotten.

Let us then roll back the pages of time and look upon the old pile, not as a member of this dismal row as we see it to-day, but in the year 1818. This is the year when William Allan put up the building and opened a general store, with its miscellaneous collection of wares ranging from silks to cheese on the one side and strong spirits and hardware on the other.

But the town of York must have a bank. Ten years before the merchants of the town had pressed the governor, Sir James Craig, for action, but he presented the bill before the Legislature and requested that the bill be excluded on the ground that the people of York were not sufficiently cultured to understand the various denominations and guard against counterfeits. The bill was not passed. But doesn't it seem funny to us now to think that a people brave and bold enough to resist the United States just four years later should be so looked upon by this same English gentleman—Sir James Craig? Sir Isaac Brock was the next to seriously attack the problem of the bank, but the war brought his proposals to a bitter end.

June of 1822 saw the proposal fairly established, and a charter was issued to the Bank of Upper Canada. At a meeting in The Grange — the spacious home of D'Arcy Boulton—Mr. William Allan was elected president of the bank, and with a loyalty that was characteristic of the man, offered the premises of his general store as a home for the new institution. Thus it was that toward the end of June in the same year the bank opened its doors. Mr. Thomas Ridout was cashier, but the title then signified duties not pertaining to that office to-day. One hundred years ago the title of cashier implied more of the chief clerk or officials just under the president.

The year 1837 brought the ill-understood insurrection of William Lyon Mackenzie, and against this bank he proceeded to work one of his little ideas which had proven successful in Montreal and Quebec, but kind fate forewarned the Bank of Upper Canada officials a few short minutes before the scene was staged. On Nov. 24, 1837, the bank officials received notification in the post from Montreal that the banks there had suspended specie payment, owing to a run on the vaults following the harangues of the insurrectionists, and that the Bank of Upper Canada was to be the next object of their attack. After a hasty consultation, Mr. Ridout advanced a scheme for the defeat of the attack, and his plans were set in motion.

The scene changes now to that of the old Doel Brewery; a portion of which still stands, encased in bill posters, at the northwest corner of Adelaide and Bay streets. Here the followers of Mackenzie, the same evening, arranged for the run on the Bank of Upper Canada to commence the following morning. When they arrived to commence the operation they were not accorded the first place in the line—some few others were ahead of them and had been standing there since early morning. The old town clock struck the hour of nine, and doors were opened for the business of the day. The first to enter was an old millwright—a friend of the bank—and he presented four one-pound notes for payment in farthings. It took so long to count the money and so long to recount it that over one hour was saved for the bank. Other supporters of the bank advanced slowly to the paying window and demanded payment of notes in the smallest of currency, and while they were counting out the coins their predecessors were depositing their withdrawals into the bank again. After two days spent in this fashion the insurrectionists saw the impossibility of draining the funds and departed.
