Letter From A. Heron

Shackleton, Sask., April 7, 1917.

Dear Sir,—How is Flesherton and everybody? We are always glad to get The Advance every week, so that we can read how everything is getting along down in old Grey County. We like it out here splendid, but our minds and hearts go back to our old home in Grey County. We had a very steady winter out here. We had no thaw from the last of November, 1916, until about two weeks ago. The frost ranged from 15 below freezing to about 50 below zero, but only a few days to 40 below and three or four nights 50 below zero, and we had very good roads all winter as we only had about eight or ten inches of snow. The snow is about all gone now. I expect we will be starting seeding in a week or ten days from now. We only had one blizzard this last winter. It lasted one day and one night, but our horses stayed out in it all and did not come home. Most of our horses have been out all winter, and they look fine. We are intending to put in over 500 acres of crop this spring. If we are not away fighting we will try and get some wheat to feed the soldiers. We always get The Advance on the Saturday after of the week it is printed.

—A. HERON.

A big cave-in of earth at the dam of the Pine River Light & Power Co. east of Hornings Mills, Shelburne's and Orangeville's former source of light supply, a week ago Friday, is understood to have put the dam in quite a dangerous condition. About 150 feet of earth at the centre of the big dam is said to have fallen in.

The Passing of a Zeppelin

When three Zeppelin airships attacked London one night last September the whole population of the city watched with anxiety to see how the new anti-aircraft guns would work. They were efficient; but it was an aeroplane, not a gun, that brought down the L-21 and that provided London with the most remarkable sight it has ever seen and the most wonderful sound it has ever heard. Mr. Lewis R. Freeman tells in the Cornhill Magazine of the fall of the Zeppelin and of the succeeding events:

Not a sound, not a shadow, heralded the flare of yellow light that suddenly flashed out in the north-eastern heavens and spread latitudinally until the whole body of a Zeppelin stood out in glowing incandescence. Then a great sheet of pink-white flame shot up, and in the ripples of rosy light that suffused the earth for scores of miles I could read the gilded lettering on my binoculars. That was undoubtedly the explosion of the ignited hydrogen of the main gas bags, and immediately following it the great frame collapsed in the middle and began falling slowly toward the earth, burning now with a bright yellow flame, above which curled black smoke. A lurid burst of light—doubtless from the exploding petrol tanks—flared up as the flaming mass struck the earth, and half a minute later, the night, except for the questing searchlights to east and south, was as black as ever again.

Then perhaps the strangest thing of all occurred. London began to cheer. I should have been prepared for it in Paris or Rome or Berlin or even New York, but that the Briton—who of all men in the world most fears the sound of his own voice lifted in unrestrained jubilation—was really cheering, and in millions, was almost too much.

Under my window half a dozen Australian Tommies were rending the air with "coo-ees" and dancing around a lamp-post, while all along the street, from doorways and windows, exultant shouting could be heard. For several blocks in all directions the cheers rang out loud and clear; the sound of the millions of throats farther afield came to my ears only as a heavy rumbling hum, a sound disturbing, unearthly, fantastic.

Certainly never before in history—not even during the great volcanic eruptions—has so huge a number of people (the fall of the Zeppelin had been visible through a fifty to a seventy-five mile radius in all directions, a region with probably from ten million to fifteen million inhabitants) been suddenly and intensely stirred up by a single event. I can hardly say yet which stirred me more deeply, the fall of the Zeppelin itself or that stupendous burst of feeling roused by its fall. Youth's Companion.

Rod and Gun

Rod and Gun for April is on the news stands and its table of contents reveals much of interest to the devotee of rod and gun. Bonnycastle Dale writes in this issue of "Laddie the Boy Trapper": A. H. Haines contributes a story "The Big Buck of Bald Knolls," desriptive of a big deer hunt under unusual circumstances in B. C.; and there are other tales of hunting, fishing and canoeing equally interesting to the lover of the out of doors. "Fishing Notes" edited by Robert Page Lincoln, is replete with up to date articles for the disciple of the immortal Isaac while such well known writers as Lieut. Townsend Whelen and Chas. Askins contribute splendid articles to the Guns and Ammunition department of this issue. W. J. Taylor, Ltd. of Woodstock, Ont., is the publisher.

Got Suspended Sentence

Guelph, April 11—Alexander Stewart, the Minto farmer who yesterday pleaded guilty before Chief Justice Sir Glenholme Falconbridge, at the spring assizes, of having used seditious words, was this morning allowed to go on suspended sentence, in giving his own recognizance in the sum of $2050 to appear for sentence when called upon. Both the crown counsel and his lordship expressed their thanks to John Rowland, the prosecutor. Stewart was ordered to pay a portion of the cost of the proceedings
