'Is the honor of the house of Kendal to be laid in the dust, tarnished, sullied, extinguished? I would rather die childless than witness such a calamity.'

'Come, I am sure, is more anxious to prevent it than myself,' rejoined Blantire 'and I am ready to avert the danger, by having the marriage celebrated at once.'

'Spoken like a true, loyal Irishman,' said the squire, giving Malvrin his hand. 'If Mary could only be broken, but she has such an obstinate spirit, and her determination is as strong as ever. I fear she will not be brought to consent.'

'I do not hope it,' returned the youth; 'but allow me to say that a romantic notion such as she has taken up and clings to with such blind infatuation, should be forcibly dealt with, and Mary will, by-and-bye, thank us for saving her from her own folly.'

'Yes, yes,' said the squire, 'Mary is a good sensible girl. Never knew her to be so headstrong before; but it all comes of reading romances. I wish some means could be fallen on to put the honor of our family out of jeopardy.'

'The means are easy,' said Malvrin with cool self-possession. Let her out for an evening walk in the park, and I will carry her off to a ruined castle I know of among the hills. Perhaps you know it—Ormond's stonghold?'

'You mean Dundarra Castle. I once visited it. You would take her up there for what purpose?'

'That we may be married. A man could be found who could perform the marriage ceremony even although Mary refused to say yes; and for a witness I can get Jacob O'Brady. We will pass the night in one of the habitable chambers of the ruin; and, after that, Mary will make no objection to to go home to Blantire Castle.'

'The plan is good,' said the squire, after musing a little bit. It is not the way the heiress of Kendal should be married, but we shall have a public ceremony afterwards, and nobody but the priest and O'Brady will know of the affair at the ruin.'

'And neither will disclose it,' said Malvrin. 'The sooner the plan is carried into effect the better—say the night after to-morrow. I will have all arrangements made, and at dusk you will allow Mary to go and walk in the park, when I will seize, mount her before me, and ride off with her. I will bring her back in the morning as my wife, and the designs of the adventurer, Hargreave, will be frustrated; for of course after that, Mary is to much a girl of principle to see the fellow again.'

Trust her for that,' rejoined the squire. 'Mary is absurdly romantic, but pure and good as an angel.'

There is no time for a settlement to be drawn as I intended; but I can trust you Malvrin. You are an Irish gentleman, and a man of honor.'

'Mary's fortune will be as much her own as if the lawyers secured it,' answered Malvrin. 'What care I for her money: it is herself I want.'

This monstrous deception passed for genuine munificence with the simple squire, who grasped the hand of the hypocrite and shook it warmly. All things being settled as favorably for his plan as Malvrin could wish, he bade the squire good night, and departed to engage the necessary accomplices. He visited O'Brady on his way home; and of course, the factor was only too glad to be a witness.

During the next day the services of a priest were secured, who engaged to proceed to the ruin with O'Brady.

On that same day, while Blantire was successfully making his arrangements for the foul plot against the honor and happiness of Mary Kendal, Terry Cushaleen and Andrew Donaldson were actively engaged in trying to find a trace of Hargreave. They proceeded to a stile at the end of Dundarra park, where Terry had come upon the marks of the scuffle. Here, while examining the ground more minutely, Andrew found a drawing pencil, which both at once identified as belonging to the missing one. This put it beyond all doubt that here Hargreave had been captured and carried off. They next endeavored to find out which direction the ruffians had taken, and in this endeavour Terry's Californian experience proved of service. He very soon got upon the trail, and they followed the footmarks through the wood till they reached the spot where the abductors had mounted on horseback with their prisoner. From thence they traced the animals' footmarks to the highway, where a soft part enabled them to see the direction which had been taken; but immediately all marks were lost on the hard beaten track, and they were brought to a stand still.

'Bedad, but it's a long way they've taken him to,' observed Terry, as he cast his eyes forward to the distant mountains. 'Sure and they meant to have him clane out of the road anyhow, if they don't ill-use him beside.'

'What are we tae dae?' inquired Andrew, 'I'm determined tae hunt him till I find him.'

'And it's myself that's bound to do that same with heart and sowl,' responded Terry. 'Only I would like to get a little bit o' knowledge of the route. If we set out blindfolded, we might wander over the mountains for six months, and miss the place at last; but, plaze God, some one who lives at the other side o' the common might see the blackguards makin' for the hills, and notice the gap they struck into.'

'Then let us awa' tae the other side of the common,' said the impatient Andrew.

'Soft and aisy,' counselled Terry. 'It's not lucky to go too fast. Afore we get to the mountain foot all the dacent boys will be in bed, and sure the wild ones arn't likely to give us any help. We'll start by sunrise in the mornin', and the long summer day is above us.'

Andrew was not so impatient but he saw that this would be the wisest plan. They therefore returned to the village, and after partaking of supper, retired to bed, that they migh be fresh for he morning start.

Andrew was installed in his master's own room, where everything belonging to Hargreave had been untouched. His portfolio lay open on the table just as he had left it; and the coat he threw off on quitting the house hung on the back of a chair where he had placed it. It cost Andrew a good deal of manful resistence to keep back the tears, when his eye fell on these things.

A choking lump rose in his throat, and had to be coughed down several times, and finally the warm hearted fellow had to retreat quickly to bed, when he could not see the thing that distressed him.

But as darkness, silence, and motionlessness are calculated to increase and intensify thought in an anxious mind, so Andrew had not been long in bed when he found he could not sleep. His anxiety on behalf of his absent master was excessive.

'This comes o' fa'in in love in a heathen kintra,' he said to himself, after lying for several hours with a harassed mind. 'At hame, nee, when twa lads want the same lass, she jist takes the ane she likes best, and the ither has tae pit up wi't the best way he can. But, preserve us a', they act here like wild savages; the one carries the ither aff, and—What's that?'

It was a low, scraping noise that fell on Andrew's ear, and lifting up his face from the coverlet, he looked towards the window and saw a man outside trying to open it. The window faced the east, and the first streaks of dawn sent a faint light into the apartment.

It was a lattice window, which opened from the centre, and was secured on the inside by an iron hasp. This hasp the man was endeavoring to lift by inserting the blade of a knife through the compartments, and this was the low, scraping sound that drew Andrew's attention.

The latter's first impulse was to spring upon the floor, and prevent the entrance of the robber; but the thought flashed on his mind that the fellow, and his presence there, might have something to do with his master's disappearance. He therefore resolved to lie quite still, and discover his object before he gave the alarm, or took any kind of action.

In less than a minute the hasp was lifted, and let quietly down on the other side. This released one half of the window, and the man had only to insert his arm to unfasten the other division, when he pushed both sides back, and the way of access was clear. Before entering, he laid his arms on the sill, leant forward into the room, and listened attentively.

Andrew moved not, breathed not; and, satisfied that the chamber was empty, the burglar crept noiselessly through the open window and alighted on the floor.

HOW LEECHES ARE BRED.

There is a curious branch of industry followed by certain inhabitants of the great march lands in the neighborood of Bordeaux, Frane. Some years ago a farmer of the district observed that the leeches native to these marches attained to a great size in places where many cattle turned out to pasture, and more particularly, where horses formed the principal stock. This suggested to him the idea of making leech-culture a specialty. He had some small capital, and this he was shrewd enough to turn to the best advantage. In the first place, he rented a tract of marsh, which he divided off into square ponds, surrounded wire railings. The water in these ponds is about fifteen inches deep, and the mud at the bottom of them afford winter quartesr for myriads of leeches, which, when the warm sun of Spring arouses them from their winter lethargy, come up to the surface very lively, and anxious for a gorge upon their natural aliment blood.

To supply this, the leech cultivator invested a portion of his capital in a drove of old horses, which were bought up by him at an average price of about twelve francs per head. No sooner were these wretched victims driven into the ponds then they were fastened upon by the leeches, whose voracious instincts were aroused the moment the water becoue agitated. Iostances are not unfrequent of horses becoming so eqhaustee by these snsatiable blood-suckers as to sink down into the watea, where they are sometimes suffocated before assistance can come to hand.

The process of catching the leeches is a very simple one. It is mostly carried on by young girls and lads, who, during the summer season, enter the ponds, wearing long, waterproof boots of thick leather, and furnished, each of them' with a sort of camp-stool and a canvas bag. Seating themselves in the ponds, they disturb the water with their feet, and immediately the leeches, imagiuing that horses have plunged into the ponds, swarm around the leech-fishers and fasten greedily upon their boots. Selecting the best grown leeches, the fishers now pick them off, and put them into their bags; and in this way many thousands are taken by them in the course of a few hours. The leeches are then carried home, and, having been culled and sorted according to size, are placed iu tubs filled with soft, moist clay, into which they immediately burrow. The tubs are then tightly covered with strong porour canvas, and in this state the leeches are taken to market.

AN OBVIOUS AND PRESSING DUTY.

"Hall's Journal of Health" gives the following suggestions, which deserves the immediate attention of all who wish to avoid the secourge of cholera, which threatens to attack us mext summer. We recommend them to the special consideration of our citizens:-

1st. Every householder owes it to himself, to his family, to his neighbours, to the community in which he resides, to have his house, from cellar to garret from the street curb to the rear line of his lot, most scrupulously cleansed, by sweeping, washing, and whitewashing.

2nd. Every man who has any authority in city or town government should consider himself bound by the oath of office, and by every consideration of humanity, to give himself no rest until every street, alley, gutter and sewer is placed in a state of as perfect cleanliness as possible, and kept so until the frosts of next season come.

3rd. These cleansings should be done now, in February and March, because, if put off until warm weather, the very effort necessary for the removal of filth will only tend, in the essential nature of things, to hasten the appearance of disease, to increase its malignity, and to extend its devastations; because the suns of spring and summer the sooner warm into life and intensify the viperic and malignant influence, which in its remorseless tread, wrecks so much of human happiness, and desolates so many hearthstones.

RAILROAD RULES OF TRAVEL.—The following 'rules of the road' are based upon legal decisions, and ought to be universally made known. The courts have decided that applicants for tickets on railroads can be ejected from the cars if they do not offer the exact amount of their fare. Conductors are not bound to make change. All railroad tickets are good till used. Conditions 'good for this day only,' or otherwise admitting time of genuineness, are of no account. Passengers who lose their tickets can be ejected from the cars unless they purchase a second one. Passengers are bound to observe decorum in the cars, and are obliged to comply with all reasonable demands to show their tickets. Standing on the platform, or otherwise violating the rules of the company, renders a person liable to be put from the train. No person has a right to monopolize more seats than he has paid for, and any article left in the seat while the owner is temporarily absent entitles him to the place upon his return.

MARRIAGE OF A NUN IN ITALY.—The Italian papers mention that a marriage in accordance with the new civil law, and without the intervention of the church, has just been celebrated at Secli, in Sicily, between a barrister named Guglienius Caruso, and a nun of the order of St. Theresa, named Myra Pisani, known as Sister Maria Annunxiata. The parents of the bride not only gave her their consent, but a dowry also. All the principal families of the neighborhood, together with the local authorities, were present at the ceremony.

The Senate of Georgio have passed a Homestead bill, exempting from execution $2,500 worth of real estate in town or country.

Hon. George Allan, M.L.C., Toronto.

Finding that there exists at the Seat of Government the necessity for a Cheap, Reliable and Expeditious Agency, through the medium of which parties living at a distance, and having business with any of the Public Departments, may be saved the expense and inconvenience of a journey, I am induced to open an office in the same building and just above that of the City Registrar, on the corner of Metcalf and Sparks streets.

Desiring that my services shall be made available to that class of persons who are unable to pay large fees, I have determined to make an exceedingly moderate charge for any business that I may be favoured with, so that it may be within the power of everyone to have a reliable Agent at the Capital. (All letters to be pre-paid.)
