THE CHANNINGS.

Judith was right in supposing the office accounts to be the object that kept him up. "What can he do with his time in the day?" she thought.

"What is it, Constance?"

"Can you let me speak to you, Hamish?"

"If you won't be long. I was just beginning to be busy," he replied, taking out the keys and putting them in his pocket.

"I see you were," she said, glancing at the ledger. "Hamish, you must not be offended with me, or think I interfere unwarrantably. I would not do it, but that I am anxious for you. Why is it that you sit up so late at night?"

There was a sudden accession of color in his face. Constance saw it; but there was a smile as well. "How do you know I do sit up? Has Judy been telling tales?"

"Judy is uneasy about it, and she spoke to me this evening. She has visions of the house being burnt up with everybody in it, and of your injuring your health fatally. I believe she would deem the latter calamity almost more grievous than the former, for you know you were always her favorite."

"Hamish interrupted her mother. "There is not. I am no favorite for the one to linger, and, I believe, too hardly for the other. Judy is a simpleton," he laughed; "she has got her safety water-butt, and what more can she desire?"

"Hamish, why do you sit up? Have you not time for your work in the day?"

"No. Or else I should do it in the day. I have enough to hurt me. I [illegible] work in the day time, and if that [illegible] cell [illegible] day."

"Is it so much behindhand?"

"No, not so much. These bright days [illegible] Church [illegible] I'll pass over the holiday [illegible] instead. Can you [illegible] enough for a [illegible]?"

"Yes, if you would work [illegible] I'll pass over the rest of your work and pay a couple of workmen to do it. Hamish, [illegible] work [illegible] time be[illegible]."

"Hamish, how do you spend your time in the day, that you cannot complete your work?"

"Oh, [illegible] gossiping and scandal [illegible] and [illegible] all night, and in Court [illegible] by that, I am [illegible] I [illegible] morning."

"Constance [illegible] tell what time she [illegible] the [illegible] expression of face, look [illegible] into [illegible]."

"One last word, Hamish, for I hear [illegible] calling to you. Are you obliged to [illegible] night?"

"I am."

"[illegible] I will say no more, and [illegible] seem as they have [illegible]."

Arthur came running up the stairs, and Hamishmet him at the chamber door. Arthur, who appeared strangely excited, began speaking in a half whisper [illegible] conversation. She heard every word.

"Judy says a young man wants you, Hamish! Tell him I'm [illegible] to serve the devil. What on earth is he [illegible]?"

"Did Judy say I was at home?"

"Yes; and has hurried him into the study to wait. Did you not hear her calling to you?"

"I [illegible] "see him," Hamish was about to say. "Yes, I will see him," he added, after a moment's reflection. "Anything calculated to have a disturbed [illegible] which might come to my mother's ears; and I suppose if he could not see me now, he would watch for me in the morning."

"Shall I go down first, and hear what he has to say?"

"Arthur, Arthur, what would do you good. I have [illegible] it [illegible] and must look to [illegible]. A Channing cannot turn coward."

"But be now not only discretion, dear Arthur. Let [illegible] the man, see if there is no help for it, I'll call [illegible]."

"Stay, Arthur, four steps at a time. He is [illegible] with his body against the chamber door, and has head [illegible]. I could be [illegible] listening [illegible] probably [illegible] Arthur came [illegible] the stairs again, his eyes [illegible]."

"Arthur dear, Hamish!" It's only Martin Pope."

"Martin Pope!" echoed Hamish, considerably relieved, for Martin Pope was an acquaintance of his, and sub-editor of one of the Helstonleigh newspapers. "Why could not Judy have [illegible] her mouth?"

He ran down the stairs, the color which had left his face, returning to it. He could [illegible] return to that of Constance; he had changed to an ashy whiteness. Arthur saw her standing; there, saw that she must have heard and comprehended all.

"O, Arthur, has it come to this? Is Hamish in [illegible] depth of debt?"

"Hush! Whatever brought you here, Constance?"

"Why, what is that he fears? Is [illegible] out against him?"

"I don't know much about it. There may be one."

She wrung her hands. "The next thing to a suit is a prison, is it not? He should be taken, what would become of the office of papa's place?"

"Do not agitate yourself," he implored. "It can do no good."

"Nothing can do good; nothing, nothing. Oh! what trouble!"

"Constance, in the greatest trouble there is always one Refuge."

"Yes," she answered, bursting into tears. "When all else fails, we can fly from all, fall out our sorrow, and hide it with Him. Oh, Arthur! what but for such a shelter, would become of us in our hour of trial?"

CHAPTER XI.

THE CLOISTER KEYS.

It was the twenty-second day of the month, and nearly a week subsequent to the date of the last chapter. Arthur Channing sat in his place at the cathedral organ, playing the psalm for the morning; for the hour was that of divine service. Mr. Channing had scarce need to enjoin him to lift up his heart in praise and thanksgiving in that sacred place, to those holy words: Arthur Channing's spirit was ever ready to bow in reverence in prayer, to ascend in praise.

"Oh, give thanks unto the Lord for he is gracious; and his mercy endureth for ever!"
