WIFE, A LOVE STORY.

"Well, my dear," said Mr. Mitford, with anxious gravity, "I don't like to blame her, but I am afraid [illegible] if she very politely, put Pudlat. It would be unfair to have so much substituting. She is always contradicting and dressing them for things that don't suit. I don't like to blame her, she has had so much to put up with, but still, you know, and of course it is discouraging, whatever one may try to do."

"And then those the little," said John, laughing [illegible]

"The little dear. I wish you would not [illegible] Every month or so I think I have [illegible] up to the point of going to [illegible] If you but know the number of bonnets [illegible] and shoes for the children [illegible] last old greatcoat which I [illegible] to alter for Robert. But it is never [illegible] I can myself for the [illegible] they never go. It is enough [illegible] head."

"Ah, people are always a trouble to [illegible]."

"Yes, but then the old woman is a [illegible]," said Mrs Mitford, with alacrity, "and [illegible]."

"Well, dear, with all these things be[illegible] does it sometimes strike you what a [illegible] business it is?" said John. "You have [illegible] the parish for twenty years [illegible]."

"Twenty-four, my dear, three before you [illegible]."

"And what is the pattern?" said John; "the [illegible] reappear just in the same way. The [illegible] and profitably, and in neither [illegible] changing on one another [illegible] work and fatigue might never have [illegible]."

"Yes, dear, I don't agree [illegible] the mother, with a [illegible] the other came [illegible] and the water to boil yet. If I had [illegible] that her life itself had been a [illegible] not have felt more. Indeed [illegible] mother, and if there was any [illegible] all her [illegible]."

"Ah, [illegible] difference in the parish [illegible] gave her such a check that, she [illegible] them with a grave [illegible]."

"And then, Sir, did [illegible] the minister, charity [illegible] of the book, and to be angry with her [illegible] and humbly, with the [illegible] I don't suppose I have [illegible] what I ought to have done, [illegible] the parish when [illegible] a sense of more energy and [illegible]."

"Ah, dear, I was that [illegible] I [illegible] the Mrs Mitfords [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] and
