FIRE & LIFE INSURANCE. THE PHŒNIX OF LONDON, Established in England in 1782 and in Canada in 1804, devoted exclusively to Fire Insurance. The Western Fire and Marine Assurance Co., of Toronto, A leading home institution. Capital and Assets, over ($2,000,000) two millions of dollars. The Queen Insurance Co., of Liverpool and London, A well-known reliable British Company. The Standard Life Insurance Co., of Edinburgh Scotland, Established in 1825. In relief funds, over ($7,000,000) seven millions of dollars. Annual income nearly ($1,000,000) four millions of dollars. This Company having lately decided to invest in Canada, the premiums received from Canadian policy holders, have adopted a table of rates for Canada that will compare favourably with any other respectable company. Plans and conditions of policies of the most liberal kind. Insurances may be effected in any of the above first class Companies, with any of the 100 fruit trees of the risk will admit, on application to the undersigned. MONEY TO LOAN on good real estate securities at low rate of interest. JAS. B. KNOWLSON, Lindsay. July 10, 1879. 1000.

Money to Loan.

$500,000. $500,000. MONEY TO LOAN on the security of First Mortgages on Improved Farm Property. Farmers should consult their own interests by applying at once to the undersigned. Those who are paying ten and twelve per cent. interest and even more to Building Societies on the instalment principle will save money and know what they are paying for. STRAIGHT LOANS, that is, principal repayable at end of term, and interest only in monthly yearly or half-yearly, at the option of the borrower, will be let to borrowers who may have the privilege of paying off the whole or any portion of the debt at any time after two years, (a clause to that effect will be written in mortgages). No extra charge will be made for this privilege. The Agent for several leading British and Canadian Fire and Life Insurance Cos. H. A. WALLIS, Dobson's Block, Kent-st., Lindsay. N.B. Money invested for private parties secured by Mortgages on Improved Farm Property. Best of references and guarantees given if required. Office over Mr. Dobson's Grocery, entrance on William-st., Lindsay, Ont. 1060 1y.

MONEY, MONEY, MONEY.

I am now prepared to negotiate straight loans on good farm property security for any term of years at right per cent interest, with the privilege of repaying any portion of the principal at any time, the interest ceasing on the sum so paid.

This gives the borrower every chance. He can pay on his mortgage any sum he may be able to spare at any time and stop the interest on so much, or he can release his farm at any time without being obliged to pay the Company a heavy bonus for taking their money. Expenses very little more than those of private loans.

S. CORNELL.

TEETH FILLED WITH GOLD And all operations in the MOUTH skilfully performed. Rooms over Mr. J. Kennedy's Store, Kent Street, Lindsay. Make no mistake in name or place. 1061

J. NEELANDS, DENTIST, begs to return thanks to the public for the confidence they have reposed in his skill and for the liberal patronage he has received during the past years. He would also beg to inform the public that time Dentistry has made wonderful progress, and he has invariably introduced every improvement in the profession after it was fully tested. For EXTRACTING TEETH WITHOUT PAIN besides Chloroform and Ether, he used Electricity and Freezing or local Anæsthesia. Over 13 years ago he introduced Nitrous Oxide Gas and since that time used it unhesitatingly and has had marvellous success in its use. Thousands of testimonials as to its efficacy can be produced by him. He claims to be one of the first in the Dominion who used coffer dam while filling teeth with gold, having seen Dr. Barnum, the inventor, give a clinic in New York City just after its introduction. He introduced Rubber Dam for the first time before the Dental Association of Ontario. In mechanical dentistry he has used almost every kind of plate that has ever been introduced. For holding Artificial Teeth firmly in the mouth he has used the various discs patented by Yemans, Gillespie and Scott. He is one of the few manufacture which is considered better than all others. He has supplied them to a number of the leading dentists who say they are far superior to all other kinds. No extra charge is made for their use. His prices have always been moderate. Artificial teeth are inserted at from $10 to $20, according to quality and kind of plate. Rooms next door to Bowes' new store, Lindsay. Oct. 19, 1879. 1049

WHAT IS GLORY?

What is glory? Say a feather
Mounted on the incurrant air,
Free of every wind and weather,
Often soiled, and seldom fair.

What is glory? Ask the maiden
Wedded to a titled drone.
Sick at heart and bea vy laden—
Empty pageantry her own.

What is glory? Ask the garter
Twining round his grace's knee,
Wouldn't thou ease and conscience barter
Such a thing on thine to see?

What is glory? Ask the lawyer,
Fearless trudging into court,
Harder work than any sawyer—
Ceaseless labor—less support.

What is glory? Ask the poet,
Pocket low and wishes high,
Wanting, and yet none must know it
All but earth, and air and sky.

What is glory? Ask the sailor,
Weather beaten, tempest tossed,
Ship his prison, winds his jailor,
Country, home and kindred lost.

What is glory? Hero striding
Madly over a ruined land,
What is glory? Time is gliding,
Death and judgment are at hand.

What is glory? Ask the Christian,
Looking for immortal joys,
He can wisely solve the question,
Heir, through Christ of paradise.

ADAM AND EVE.

OR, THE SMUGGLERS OF PENZANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DOROTHY FOX."

Chapter VII.

Joan nodded assent.

"Why, who's her like, eh? Not her father—no, but somebody I've knowed. Why, I'll tell 'ee: my sister Avice that was drownded saving another maid's life, that's who 'tis. Well, now I never! to think o' Andrew's maid bein' like she! Well, she was a regular picture, she war, and so good as she war handsome."

"That shows us both comes o' one family," said Joan, rubbing her rosy cheek against the old man's weather-stained visage.

"Not a bit of it," he laughed; "but I'll tell 'ee what: she's got a touch of our Adam here, so well as both named together, too. My feyther, poor old chap! he couldn't abide his name hisself nowas, but us two lads, Andrew and me, us allays swored that our children, whether boys or maids, 'cordin' as they comed first, should be Adams and Eves; and us kept our words, the both o' us, ye see. Here, Adam!" he called, "come hither lad and stand up beside thy cousin. I want to take the measure of 'ee together, side by side."

But Adam, though he must have heard, neither answered nor came in: and after waiting for a few minutes his father, by way of apology, promised to Eve that he had gone up to "titivate a bit," while, jerking his finger over his shoulder, he asked Joan in a stage aside if she wind had shifted anyways contrary.

Joan shook her head, answering in a low voice that it would be all right and she would run out and listen in the supper; and some ten minutes later, while Eve was detailing to her uncle some of the events of her past life—how her mother and she had lived and how they had contrived to support themselves—Adam reappeared, and Uncle Zebedee, pointing to a seat near, endeavored to include him in the conversation; but whether Eve's past history had no interest for her cousin, or whether he had not quite overlooked her small rebuff, she could not decide. At any rate he seemed to be much more amused by listening to her—attentions which was by no means unwilling to return his banter while she moved about and in and out the room, the two carried on a very smart fire of rough joking, which gradually began to interest Uncle Zebedee, so that he left off talking to listen; and very soon Eve found herself at liberty to indulge her hitherto restrained curiosity and take a critical survey of Adam, who lounged on the chest opposite, with his whole attention so apparently engrossed by Joan as to render it doubtful whether the very existence of such a person as Eve had not entirely escaped his recollection.

Certainly Adam was a man externally fitted to catch the fancy of most women, and neither was he tried in such a seeming indifference to herself she tried in vain to discover some fault of person to which she could take objection; but it was of no use battling with the satisfaction her eyes had in resting on such perfection, heightened by the gratifying knowledge that between them an evident likeness existed. Adam had the same fair skin, which exposure had tanned but could not redden; his hair, although of a warmer tint, was of a shade similar to her own; his eyes were gray; his brows and lashes dark.

Absorbed in trying to compare each separate feature Eve seemed lost in the intensity of her gaze, so that when, Adam suddenly looking round, their eyes met (during one of those lapses for which time has no measurement), Eve sat fascinated and unable to withdraw her gaze. A kindred feeling had apparently overcome Adam too, for the spell broken, he jumped up and with something between a shake and a shiver walked abruptly to the far end of the room.

"Here, Adam," called out Joan, who had stepped into the outer kitchen, "don't 'ee go out now, like a dear. I'm just takin' the things on supper won't be a minute afore it's in, and if it's put back now 'twill all be samsawed and not worth eatin'." And to strengthen her entreaty she hastened in and set on the table a substantial smoking-hot pie.

"Why, wherever now has Eve got tof' she exclaimed, looking round the room. "I left her sitting there not a minute agone."

"Eh! what? who's gone?" exclaimed Uncle Zebedee, roused from a cat's sleep, in which, with a sailor-like adaptation of opportunity, he was always able to occupy any spare five minutes.

"I think she ran up-stairs," said Adam. "Here, I'll call her," he added, intercepting Joan as she moved toward the door which, from the innermost portion of the room, led to the upper part of the house. "Cousin Eve!" he called out, "Cousin Eve! supper's waitin', but we can't begin till you come down."

"Yes, and bear a hand like a good maid," chimed in Uncle Zebedee, "for 'ee haven't had nothin' to speak of to clane our teeth 'pon this last forty-eight hours or so; and I for one am pretty sharp set, I can tell 'ee."

This appeal being irresistible Eve hastened down, to find Adam standing so that when she placed her hand on the door-handle he, on pretence of opening it to a wider convenience, put his hand over hers, leaving Eve in doubt whether the unnecessary pressure was the result of accident or an attempt at reconciliation. One thing was evident: Adam was bent on thoroughly doing the honors of the table; he made a point of assisting Eve himself; he consulted her preference and offered the various things to her—attentions which Eve as a stranger and a guest thought herself, from the son of the house, perfectly entitled to, but which Joan viewed with amazement, not liking as it was Adam to interfere but feeling confident that Eve must be very embarrassed by a politeness not at all current in Polperro, where the fashion was for the men to eat and drink and the women to sit by and attend upon them.

But Adam was opposed to general usage, and any deviation was leniently accepted by his friends as the result of his having been schooled at Jersey—a circumstance that Joan considered he was now bent upon showing off; and noting that do or say what he might Eve would not raise her eyes she pitied her confusion and good-naturedly tried to come to her rescue by endeavoring to start some conversation.

"Did 'ee try to make friends with Jerrem, Adam?" she asked, reverting to a portion of their previous talk.

"Reason!" he answered, pettishly—"what good is there in anybody reasoning with him?"

"Awh, but he'll always listen to a soft word," said Joan, pleadingly: "you can lead Jerrem anyways by kindness."

"Pity you weren't there to manage him," said Adam, in not the most pleasant tone of voice.

"Well, I wish you had been there, Joan," said Uncle Zebedee decisively, "for I ain't well pleased with the boy being left behind—he'll be gettin' into some mischief, I'm afraid, if he won't be free un from. I'd rather be half have spoke to un sharp myself—he allays minds anythin' I say to un he does."

"Wa, a fine, then, you hold your tongue so long," said Adam, whose face began to show signs of rising displeasure. "I only knew this, that over and over again you've said to me 'I wouldn't nob run the risk of bein' kept waitin' about when he knew the time for startin'. Why, no later than the last run you said that if it happened agen you'd go without him."

"Yes, ias, 'tis true I said so," said the old man, querulously, "but he knawed I didn't mane it. How should I, when I've been a youngster myself, and all of us to Madame Farrn's dancin' and fiddlin' away like mad? Why, little chap as I be," he added, looking around at the two girls with becoming pride, "I was taken so many as six to fiddle an' an' when they've a-gotten me to the boat they've had to thraw me into the water till I've bin a' bal drowned 'fore they could knock a bit o' sense into me. But what o' it all? Why, I be none the warse for that, I hopes."

Adam felt his temper waxing hot within him, and having no wish that any further display of it should be then manifested he rose up from the table, saying that it was time he ran down to the boat again; and old Zebedee, warmed by an expressive frown from Joan, swallowed down the remainder of his reminescences and kept a discreet silence until the retreating footsteps of his son assured him that he could relieve himself without fear of censure.

"Is along of his bein' a scholard, I suppose," he exclaimed with the air of one seeking to solve a perplexity, "but he's has agen anybody bein' the warse o' a drink o' liquor as never was."

"Ferrem's one that's too easily led astray," said Joan, by way of explaining to Eve the bearings of the case, "and once awar he forgets all but what's goin on around un; and that don't do, ye know, 'cos when he's bin told that they'm to start at a certain time he ought to be there so well as the rest, 'specially as he knaws what Adam is."

"Ias, and that's the whole rights of it," returned Zebedee with a conclusive nod. "Mister Adam goes spakin' up about last time: 'And mind we ain't agoin' to wait for no wan'"—and the imitation of his son's voice conveyed the annoyance the words had probably given—"and the boy's hild was up. 'Tis more than strange that they two, raised like brothers, can never steer wan course. I'd rayther than twenty pounds this hadn't happened," he added after a pause.

"But how comed 'ee to go when you knawed he wasn't there?" asked Joan.

"I never knawed he wasn't there," replied the old man. "I can't think how 'twas," he said, scratching his head in the effort to assist his memory, "I'd a bin up to Renold's, takin' a drap wi' wan or t'ruther, mysel' I don't mind much about anythin' else till us was well past the Spikles; and then after a time I axed for the lad and out it all comes."

"And what did 'ee say then?" asked Joan.

"Wa-al, what could I say! Nothin' that 'ud fetch un back then. 'Sides, Adam kept flingin' it at me that I'd said last time I wouldn' wait agen. But what if I did! I knawed, and he knawed, and Jerrem knawed 'twasn't nothin' more than talk. Moreover which I sure he'd ha' come with Zeke John's in the 'Stamp and Go.' But no, they had never a laid eyes on un, though they started a good bit after we."

"He's sure to get on all right, I supposef" said Eve.

"Awh, he can get on fast enough if he's mind to. 'Tain't that I'm thinkin' on—I'm afraid he'll do a deal bin' twixt the two of 'em. If I only knawed how I'd send un a bit o' my mind in a letter," he added, looking at Joan.

"Wa-al, who could us get to do it, then? There's Jan Curtis," she said, reflectively, "only he's to Looe; and there's Sammy Tucker, but, Lord! it would be all over the place and no holding mother any ways—she'd be certain to let on to Adam."

"It mustn't come to Adam's ears," said Zebedee, decisively. "Can't 'ee think o' nobody else that is scholard enuff?"

"If it's nothing but a letter I can write, Uncle Zebedee," said Eve, rather shyly, and not quite clear whether Joan did or did not possess the like accomplishment.

"Can
