The Real Gladstone

Mr. Gladstone is an embodied expression of England's greatness; the most eminent representative of a nation over whose territory the sun ever shines. Such an imposing personality commands universal attention. We know that he is a scholar of superior attainments. We know that he is not only a believer in, but a defender of Christianity. We know that he is a philanthropist, for his earnest and indignant words in behalf of the prosecuted Armenians have thrilled the world.

We know that he is a statesman of supreme endowments, and one of the most notable conversationists living. Few men can compare with him in knowledge, experience, reminiscence, brilliancy. He has known all the men and women most worth knowing for the last two and a half generations. What a school to have graduated from!

But in all this astonishing superiority we do not find the real Gladstone until we recognize the moral motive of his life—the mainspring of his character. Perhaps the following simple story may help us do this:

During his last premiership one of Mr. Gladstone's house-servants was in great distress because of the increasingly bad habits of her son. Drink and evil companions were rapidly ruining him, and he seemed to be drifting irrevocably beyond her influence. The good woman had spent much time in prayer, and was longing and seeking for some way by which her wayward child could be saved.

In her distress she thought of her master. It seemed presumptuous that she should unburden her sorrw to him—the great man, burdened with the cares of state, the master of England, India, Australia, Egypt and the great oceans—and tell him her trouble. She was ready for any ordinary endeavor to save the wanderer, but ought she, could she do this?

Maternal love finally prevailed over fear, and the poor woman ventured to approach the Prime Minister's study. Her knees trembled and her heart sank. She knocked timidly and then went in.

"Please, sir, I have come to you because my boy is going to the bad, and my poor words have no weight with him. I made bold to come and tell you, hoping perhaps you might speak to him. No one can do what you can do. Forgive me, sir, but I had to come!"

The cry of supreme distress was sufficient. Mr. Gladstone threw immediately from his mind all affairs of state, and after a few words of sympathy, and in hope that possibly he might save an erring soul, said, "Send him right in. I will speak with him," and waited patiently until the bold-eyed lad had slouched into the room. The young man was somewhat abashed, but seemed resolute and almost defiant.

"Sit down, my lad, and let us talk together for a few moments," said the premier, with the same courtesy that he might have extended to one of his Cabinet. In a few minutes the boy was disarmed by the great man's gentle manner. He expected to find a scolding judge; he discovered a tender man.

Advice was followed by remonstrance. Then, when he had become responsive and was almost moved to tears, Mr. Gladstone said:

"Now let us kneel down to pray."

The kindly action, the interest, the earnest prayer were too much for the young prodigal to withstand. He arose from his knees and left the study, let us hope, a saved man

Viewing a scene like this, we feel that we know Mr. Gladstone and the sources of his motive in life. The pattern of his greatness is the Man of Galilee, who was friend and brother to all mankind.—Youth's Companion.

Edward Wicklow, James Dundas and Minorgan, Chatsworth, have been committed for trial for burglary. All were admitted to bail.

The Rossland Miner, in a recent issue says: "The outside press will confer a favor on the people of this community if it will inform the public that there are more laborers now in Rossland than can find work, and there will soon be a little army of unemployed laborers without resources if they pour into the district at the present rate. It is impossible for Kootenay to provide work for men who can do nothing but manual or clerical work at the rate such persons are coming to the country. Prospectors, miners and people with a little capital can find good opportunities in the Kootenay. Others are only inviting misfortune by coming here at present.
