Sir Oliver's Criminal Code

A despatch from Ottawa says that Sir Oliver Mowat, Minister of Justice, has completed his amendments to the criminal code and they are of the most drastic character. The most extreme moralist could demand nothing more rigid than Sir Oliver's amendments. It is doubtful, however, whether they will carry intact. One of the most important sections is designed to put an end to pugilistic exhibitions by giving a newer and more sweeping definition to the words "prize fight." This is the new definition: "A prize fight means an encounter or fight with fists or hands between two persons who have met for such purpose by previous arrangement made by or for them."

A second amendment will kill Mr. Corbett's profits on the kinetoscope in this country.

The new section runs: "Every one is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding five thousand dollars and not less than five hundred dollars or to imprisonment not exceeding twelve months with or without hard labor or to both, who

"(a) Exhibits by means of a biograph, vitascope, kinetoscope, kinematograph or any kindred device or machine a picture or representation of a prize fight, or

"(b) Brings into Canada or procures to be brought into Canada to or for him, or posts for transmission or delivery by or through the post, any picture or other material or appliance to be used in such an exhibition."

What is called "the social evil" is stringently dealt with also. The circulation of indecent pictures or literature is dealt with and the word "publicly" struck out so that it now becomes a criminal offence to circulat privately or to privately display anything of an indecent character whether it is written, type-written or printed. The maximum penalty is two years imprisonment.

Yet another stringent clause is that which subjects any individuals who live as man and wife for 12 moths and are not married, to one years imprisonment and $1,000 fine.

The age of consent is raised to 18 years in the case of girls and intercourse with any unmarried woman under 21 years of age is practically made a criminal offence.

Birds and the Farmers

It has been noticeable by observers that birds are becoming more plentiful here each succeeding summer and new varieties are arriving. Particularly is this noticeable of that brightly colored little songster, the Baltimore oriole. A few years ago this bird was never seen here, but now has become quite plentiful during the early summer months. We attribute this to the fact that they are allowed to remain unmolested and to raise their broods in security. It is well that this is so. A writer in the Ladies' Home Journal for May, dealing with the value of birds to crops and vegetation, says:

"Anybody who has given even the most cursory attention or study to botany knows that all forms of life have their origin in plant life. Every animal which exists either lives directly on some plants, or on insects which destroy plants. The birds fine their sustenance mainly in the insects that injure vegetation and ofttimes kill it entirely. A sufficiently large number of insects will kill a crop. If there are no birds, naturally the insects have everything their own way. I have recently gone to considerable pains to find out from farmers to what extent the decrease of birds is affecting their crops, and I find that the condition is more alarming than we, who live in the cities and large centres, have any idea of. All the farmers to whom I spoke or wrote agreed that last year the increase of insects was unusually great, while the decrease of birds was even greater. For every hundred birds killed, about sixty are born. Hence it is easy to see that the greater the number of birds killed the more exposed become the crops of the farmers to the insects. The same may be said of our trees, for the bird is really the balance of nature. To what extent this balance is being upset by fashion is easy to realize from the statement that during 1896 the plumage of over three millions of birds was received in New York."

Don't kill the little honey-bee. Now in the course of a few days spraying fruit trees will be the order of the day. Great care should be taken by farmers and fruit growers in spraying their fruit trees and plants. If done while in full bloom, hundreds of innocent lives are destroyed that have a very important part to perform in the productiveness of the and. Bees are in reality our best friends, and anything that tends to destroy the life of bees, should be strictly avoided. If spraying is done while the trees are in bloom the poison falls on the bees working on them. It not only kills those working on the blossom, but is gathered with the pollen and nectar, conveyed to the hive and the brood feed on it. Needless to say they never reach maturity. Spraying is more effective if done just after the bloom falls, and will then be of no harm to the bees. Don't kill the little honey-bee with injudicious spraying. —Ex.
