For Merrie England.

BY M. RICHARDSON.

Leaving the port of Montreal, we steamed down the St. Lawrence, and as the morning mists cleared away, and the sun rose, we watched with constantly increasing interest the varied and ever-changing panorama on both shores of the river. For a long distance below Montreal its average width is about two miles, but widens out to ten miles in breadth at Lake St. Peter, which is some thirty miles long; then gradually contracting until we reach Quebec, distant 180 miles from Montreal. Along the whole distance the shores are dotted with hamlets, villages and towns, and we could not but remark the magnificence of the churches in every little place as compared with other buildings, the massive towers and tall spires, each surmounted with a cross, indicating power and predominence of the Catholic church in the province of Quebec.

The strong current of this mighty river enables outgoing vessels to make good time in the run to Quebec, where we arrived at 4 p.m. and dropped anchor. We passed on our left the cove where Wolfe and his brave little army landed the night before the battle on the plains behind the city. Point Levi, on the opposite shore to Quebec, has grown wonderfully since I last saw it, and is now a large town with some very fine public buildings, and ferry boats are constantly plying between it and Quebec. The old city has a somewhat changed aspect since I was here. Dufferin Terrace has been built, a beautiful promenade facing the river, and though on a lower level than the citadel yet overlooking the old town. Having obtained leave to go on shore I hailed a boat on the river, and although engaged at the time the owners promised to come back for us, and in a short time were along side waiting for our descent, which, with willing, helping hands, and ropes, we easily accomplished. We had the boat to ourselves; no other lady ventured to leave the ship, so I gave my wife credit for having more than her share of woman's curiosity, but she claims the credit on the score of courage. Ashore we were met by a crowd who in a babel of tongues offered to drive us to Jacob's or anywhere else for next to nothing. We made our choice, and our Jehu politely informed us in French-English of his intention to show us everything in and round Quebec. Arrived in front of Laval University, he made a desperate attempt to tell us what it was and famed, but gave this English letter in hand by the time we arrived at Dufferin Terrace. "Dis is Wolfe and Montcalm monument, and here I can show de place vare Montgomery was killed a little far from de place he run away." We gathered flowers from the Terrace which commands such a magnificent view of the river, then went to the citadel, where, at its inner gateway, our guide got drawn to meet the sentry on duty and told him of our wish to be admitted. This was made known to the officer of the guard who gave permission and detailed a broad shouldered Highlander to show us over the fortress. The Governor-General was in residence in the citadel for the summer, and the entrance to his house stood wide open and had a homelike aspect, and did not look grand to be comfortable. The view up and down the river from the battlements have been a home training to Canadian children in our common school readers, where we have seen engravings from sketches by Lady Dufferin Lansdowne.

The citadel, which covers several acres, is said to cover about four acres, and is on an elevation of 350 feet above the river, and has cost a million and a half sterling. Quebec is the Gibraltar of Canada. Most of the buildings are of stone, and the Plains of Abraham are now a beautiful park. Now we visited the Tower Armory in which are 75,000 stands of arms, which being, as we were told, in good condition, a force of 50,000 men could be armed in a few hours. The small hours set and the shades of evening were gathering around us as we reluctantly left this memorable spot. In imagination we had filled the plain with contending armies, the cries of combatants, the roar of cannon, the rattling of musketry, and shouts of victory and here was a Frenchman, a descendant of the race whose arms met such a signal defeat, showing us the spot with as much interest and apparent pride as if the French had been the victors. They fought bravely and defended the old fortress gallantly, but Wolfe's stategem took them by surprise and won for Britain the key to this country.

The Parliament buildings are comparatively new and of a very ornate style of architecture. We returned to our boat, as daylight was gone, and next morning proceeded on our way towards the ocean.

The Milton Reformer of last week contained a scathing editorial anent the disgraceful scenes witnessed on the streets of that town on fair day. "Whiskey," says the Reformer, "reigned supreme, and the air was filled with shouts and curses of drunken men, fighting, staggering, rolling in the mud so that they looked like hogs in the mire." Truly a terrible picture and one, we trust, which will never be reproduced. —[Streetsville Review.
