The Future of Censorship

(By Norman Marshall)

OTTAWA: Among those government offices which are being greatly reduced in size with the end of the war in Europe are those of Press and Postal censorship. Postal censorship is now confined largely to the mail of the 35,000 prisoners of war in Canada, and changes in the set-up of Press censorship are expected shortly.

Outside of Ottawa however, censorship has not ceased with the close of the European struggle. No official statement has yet been made here on the government's view of the tight censorship which surrounds the Big Three conference at Potsdam. While Canadian leaders are not actually taking part there, Canada, as a member of the United Nations, with both financial and political committments to that body, has a very real concern with the decisions made here. Criticism of the censorship blackout has come from the British and American press and from the Senate in Washington. While admitting that much of the discussion a Potsdam centers on the war in the Pacific, and can therefore be justly kept secret for military reasons, these critics maintain that the plans of the Big Three for economic and political supervision of Europe should be made openly.

Officials sources here are also silent over the attacks, launched particularly from the United States, against allied policy in the Balkans, and especially against the operations of UNRA. Not only has a political crisis developed within the past two weeks between Greece and Yugo-Slavia, but political censorship has survived in Greece months after all military need had disappeared. This cloud of politcial censorship has permitted suspicion to appear in isolationist circles concerning the workings of UNRA in Greece.

And yet political censorship may not have ceased altogether in Ottawa itself. There is the story of Major Robin Fraser, D.S.O. of Toronto, that, following the charges made last Fall by Major Conny Smythe about overseas reinforcements, an order had been issued by the army overseas that copies of all statements made to the press by returning veterans were to be sent to district headquarters and then to Ottawa. While there are reasonable grounds for this regulation, Major Fraser stated that it led to fear on the part of returning veterans that they could not speak their minds about possible grievances without losing their gratuities. This order comes perilously near to outright censorship though not actually bearing that name.
