TANK EVACUATES FLOOD VICTIMS

Pressed into rescue service, an Army tank evacuates people stranded in Windsor, England, by flood waters four feet deep. Heavy rains and thawing snow swelled waterways throughout southern England.

Electric Iron Dries And Then Presses

August Purpura, of Chicago, has patented an electric iron which can be used to dry and press materials too wet for an ordinary flatiron, claims the Christian Science Monitor.

Mr. Pupura's iron has its face grooved with a number of small channels radiating from a common point of origin. Through holes in a nipple located at this center point, steam from the fabric, generated by contact with the hot face of the iron, is sucked up by a partial vacuum created by a special electric pump inside the iron. The accelerated removal of the water vapor from the surface of the fabric greatly speeds the drying process and the goods are soon in the proper state to take a good pressing with the iron.

The element which heats the iron is on the same electrical circuit as the vacuum pump, so only one cord and plug connecting the iron with the house current is necessary.

ISSUE 14—1947

SPOTS OF SPORTS

By FRANK MANN HARRIS
("A Six Bit Critic")

To the unbiased onlooker it is interesting to note the air of puzzled bewilderment currently being worn by various prominent sports figures, such as Messrs. Leo Durocher, Larry McPhail and others too numerous to mention in detail. These gentlemen just cannot seem to realize and accept one of the saddest facts of life—namely, that the very same stuff which got you a heap of acclaim and applause only yesterday doesn't necessarily rate such a big stand today.

* * *

Their plight somehow reminds us of an incident that came under our observation many years ago and has stuck in the bog of memory ever since. Next door to us a little boy, two years old or so, was just beginning to talk fairly fluently; and his proud grandfather was laughingly encouraging the tiny lad to shout rude and impertinent things not only to himself, the granddad, but at passers-by. The kid's mother noticed what was going on. "Don't forget, grandpa," she quietly remarked, "that in another year you'll be expecting me to spank Willie, and wash his mouth with soap, for just the same things you find so funny now."

* * *

For years past some of our big sports heroes have been getting away with modified murder, and not so greatly modified at that, aided and abetted by a lot of folks who should have known better. In boxing, Mike Jacobs and his cohorts have been running the sort of racket which, if it had occurred in any other line of business, would probably have landed them for a lengthy stretch on the inside looking out. Yet when they drew million-dollar gates with bouts which, on the face of them, would make any self-respecting skunk hold its nose, the general reaction from press and public was that it added up to mighty smart promotion.

* * *

Folks like Leo Durocher took pride in raising rowdiness and disrespect for rules to a fine art. They publicly gloried, not in the skill, but in the toughness and scrappiness of their teams, and made their strongest appeal to the lowest instincts of the customers. Yet their bawling and umpire-baiting won them, instead of well-merited censure, reams of priceless publicity in the press, countless radio appearances, to say nothing of acres of pictures in the slick-paper magazines.

* * *

Sports reporters and "special writers" have, of course, a lot to answer for. Naturally, they follow the lines of least resistance; and when you have to knock off a couple of columns about a dull hockey game, a manager who chases a referee all over the ice is far more help than the same manager sitting quietly in his pew and minding his own business. If you are writing three or four thousand words about some sports figure, what is known as 'color' is a real aid. Babe Ruth, with his liking for the brew and dislike of discipline, makes far more readable 'copy' than a decent-living citizen such as Lou Gehrig; and a Babe Pratt is much easier to make interesting than, let's say, a Syl Apps. We know, because we've tried it both ways.

* * *

So then, human nature being what it is, possibly it's no more than natural that such widely-publicized gentry should get the notion that they are outside and beyond the rules applying to us ordinary, run-of-the-mine citizens and—when public taste changes and folks become fed-up with antics once found so entertaining—for them to wonder just what sort of a bomb has hit them.

Still the Best

Britian no longer can hope to have the largest navy in the world, but can have the best-equipped and is certain to have the best-manned, John Dugale, financial secretary to the Admiralty, told the House of Commons.

Dugale presented an estimate for an expenditure of £196,700,000 ($786,800,000) for 1947-48.

He disclosed that the British and Dominion navies had accounted for 4,600 mines during 1946, but had suffered no casualties.
