DEAR DORIS — I have an illegitimate girl a month old. The fellow I'm going steady with is not the father.

If we get married, do you think that my boy friend would throw it up to me about the baby's father. Do you think he would resent her?

My boy friend's mother had him by another man before she got married. Knowing this, I thought that he might be able to understand my situation better. He told me that he wishes his mother had given him up for adoption.

I was going to give my baby up for adoption but once I saw her I just couldn't. I loved her too much. My boy friend said he wouldn't let it change things for us if I keep her.

Twenty And In Love

DEAR TWENTY — I simply coudn't say; it depends so much on the personality of your boy friend.

If he loves you a great deal, he may come to love this baby as his own. Some fathers do. But I do know of young husbands who harbor some resentment down deep, only to revive it later on, reminding his wife in the course of some childish quarrel about discipline, that the child is not his.

My reply about that is, of course, that a child becomes yours more through the love and care you give him than by any accident of birth Adoptive parents are proving this every day

DEAR DORIS — I am a widow. At the age of 43, a fresh start is indicated. Teaching pays a good salary but is terribly demanding of evening and weekends and my own children get little attention.

I could:

1. Stay on here but find another job — possibly bookkeeping. I have no business training but am reasonably bright.

2. Move to a country location where the cost of living is low Live on savings and whatver employment I can find.

3. Go to live at our summer cabin, which is winterized. This is only accessible by water and we would be stormbound for many days in the year. The children would get schooling by correspondence and we could be nearly selfsufficient.

Widow With Two Children

DEAR WIDOW — Eliminate number three right away. With no husband, no roots, no inlaws even, you are lonely enough. Why not seek a less demanding teaching assignment? People who change horses in midstream often wish they could change back to the old familiar nag.

But there are government allowances for widows raising children on their own. Explore this.
