All Moonshine

From the Toronto World

"When I cannot get elected in Centre Grey I will go out of politics," said Hon. I. B. Lucas, Attorney General, yesterday when discussing a report in the Farmers' Sun, to the effect that owing to the United Farmers' opposition in his constituency he would "seek a safe riding, possibly in Toronto."

"It is all moonshine," was Mr. Lucas' comment on that point.

GOD SAVE THE KING

Tommy Got Apple Pie.

The Salvation Army hut beside the Varennes road was just a ruined wall and a few pieces of gunnysack. A loose and weary soldier was halted before it by a sign which said there would be nothing doing till the morrow, and that there was no admission except on business. So he went in immediately. "Sorry, but our truck hasn't come yet and we won't have a canteen here till to-morrow." "Guess I go to bed hungry," said the visitor, turning away. "You see, we don't open till morning. I haven't a thing here for you except—wait a moment—yes, I could let you have an apple pie." The soldier gaped. "But I've only got five hundred francs." "Rubbish. Take the darned thing. We had only enough stuff to cook the one." A moment later truck drivers trundling at dusk along the road saw standing at the side a stimulating picture. It was a rain-drenched Tommy. On his face there was a beatific smile. In his hands there rested (in passing) a sweet, warm, generous, flaky, spicy apple pie.

VEGETABLE MARKETING

High Prices Are Paid for Best Quality.

Provide Abundance of Cool Water for Dairy Cows During Hot Weather—Shade In Pasture Also Essential — Ideal Location on Banks of Cool, Pure Stream.

(Contributed by Ontario Department of Agriculture, Toronto.)

FEW growers realize the importance of properly harvesting and marketing their early vegetables. The large majority are expert enough to produce an excellent crop, but there is perhaps only about one out of ten that harvest and market their crop to the best advantage. The public is today, perhaps more than before, demanding a high grade product. They are willing to pay the price if they get the quality, and the gardener that will make the greatest success will be the one that caters to this demand.

There are several factors of great importance necessary to achieve the greatest amount of success. Foremost of these, perhaps, is proper harvesting. Few, even of our growers, realize how rapidly our vegetables deteriorate in quality after they are taken from the ground. Much of the fine flavor and crispness is lost in the case of such products as onions, lettuce and radishes in only a few hours unless special care is exercised in handling. Such crops should never be exposed to winds or the hot sun and if they can be kept in a cool, fairly moist condition, the least possible loss in quality will be maintained.

To market the vegetable crop to best advantage the grower must ever keep in mind the ultimate destination of his goods. The housewife is the one that he must please. If she is well pleased then she tells her neighbors quietly over the back fence, but if she finds that she has received something of very inferior quality then she proclaims her grievance from the housetops and forever after will be hard to convince that there is such a thing as high quality.

The most important factors to bear in mind are few in number and are not hard to put into practice. The proper degree of maturity is the first one that must be considered. Carrots, beets, onions, radishes and the other bunching crops should not be pulled before they reach the proper size. They should be carefully pulled and taken to the bunching houses. There they are neatly bunched, tied and washed and then should be protected from the atmosphere as much as possible by covering. Lettuce, spinach, parsley, cabbage and cauliflower should be carefully cut and placed in baskets or carriers. Care should be taken that none of the dirt is taken up and allowed to fall through the leaves, as this is hard to remove even by careful washing and will always lower the quality.

There is perhaps not more than one person in ten that can be called a really successful salesman, and here is where a good many of our growers fall down, and after producing a high grade product they are unable to market it to the best advantage. The first requisite, as has already been mentioned, is a high grade article. An inferior grade cannot be expected to obtain the highest price. The proper care in preparation is also important. A neat, attractive package, well-packed, with high grade vegetables will always command the higher price. Furthermore, an attractive article will be its own salesman, and no matter how overstocked the market may be, will command a good price. The proper care in sorting and grading is also quite important. Vegetables of poor quality should never be placed on the market. They will not only have to be sold at a much lower price but will also have the effect of lowering the price on the higher grades, with the result that many a good market has been almost ruined by a small quantity of inferior goods.

From this we see that the greatest results can only be obtained by growing a high grade article, carefully harvested and attractively and efficiently marketed.—A. H. McLennan, B.S.A., Ontario Vegetable Specialist.
