The Advance man took a trip this week that will long be rembered by him —an auto trip to Tobermory at the head of the Bruce peninsula. We left home Saturday morning for Lions' Head, arriving there about five hours later. Sunday evening the trip was made to the "Tub," and Monday forenoon was spent fishing for bas on the Lake Huron side of the peninsula. In the afternoon we started for home, arriving here at 11.15 at night. The distance travelled was about 230 miles--115 and back—through some of the wildest and most desolate country that a car ever ran through. From Lions Head north the county of Bruce has produced what they call a gravel road clear to Tobermory, and we suppose they did their best ; at least we will charitably think so. The best, however, is a nightmare for much of the way, through, around and over rocky hills and ridges, over a country all burned over and covered now with small second growth, and black dead trees pointing upward among the green. The streets and roads in the immediate vicinity of the Tub are really fine and as good as anything we have here. The trip was very interesting and one we have long desired to take. Best of all, absolutely no mishaps occurred.

ENGLAND'S FACE CHANGED.

One of the Effects of War and Worry.

To the question, "Have our faces altered?" your reply might be a scornful negative, but you would be wrong. Our faces have altered, says London Answers.

You cannot judge of the change by looking at those with whom you come in daily contact. But if you had known a set of people pretty intimately, had been away for a few months, and then returned, you would, with a hint of what to look for, observe the change at once.

Country folk who for two or three years have not been, say, to London, have noticed that people literally "look different," and a medical man, who not only makes his preliminary diagnosis by studying his patients' faces, but also makes a hobby of face study, corroborates the fact of the change.

People—town dwellers more particularly—have developed the "peering look." That came when streets were darkened. Several people out of ten, at least, have "grown" two little vertical lines on their foreheads, as most short-sighted folk generally do.

There is, too, among civilians, a stoop forward of the shoulders. That is the natural position one takes when moving cautiously in darkness. Four years of light restrictions has stereotyped it in thousands. Watch a crowd to-day and prove it! There is, too, what the medical expert calls the "anxious - listening - thinking" look. He says that 80 per cent. of the residents in a certain southeast seaside town—a muchly raided place during the war—have it. Why is only too apparent! When, night after night, anyone sits anxiously listening for sirens, maroons, guns and bomb explosions, inward feelings are bound to leave their outward marks.

The "thinking" look—war and its risks made us think—is that curious expression of the eyes which arises from the mental picturing of possibilities. It was very marked among fighting men.

Faces, too, are longer—not because of depressed spirits, but because rationing and the cutting off of so much that fattened faces — pastry, sweets and the like—thinned faces down. "Refined" might be the better word, possibly.

Mouths are grimmer and straighter. Just as the man or woman who has a hard fight to live gets that grim, straight lipped mouth, so, too, he or she who fights twice daily for a place in bus, tube or tram, gets it! Watch the next pushing crowd and see for yourself. And then look at your own face.

The antidote? The corrective? Smile! Smile at everything you can! Smiling makes lines, but smile lines cross out and cancel the other ones.

Buffalo Roam In Australia.

When Australians refer to their empty north, they do not always recall the fine herds of buffalo which roam in the northern territory. The buffalo has prospered greatly since the first animals were imported, and his hide and horns offer a fairly easy source of revenue. In the hot, wide territory over which the "mud buffalo" roams, it is not feasible to use him as a new source of food supply, and attempts at yarding have shown that the buffalo is a true Australian, as he resents being driven and expresses this resentment vigorously. It is stated that the mud buffalo has four stomachs and does not chew the cud.

Anthony Farmer, the Austrian who was suspected of having set fire to George Torrance's barn in Caledon five weeks ago, appeared before the police magistrate at Brampton and was acquitted. Bob Cook, famous in other days, came to the rescue of the lad and put up the money for the defence out of his own pocket. He engaged A. R. Hassard, a Toronto lawyer, to defend the boy, paying him $100 for his day's work. The evidence against the lad was purely circumstantial.
