Married Twice in a Week

Acton Free Press: A rather precipitate marriage took place last week when a young man employed in town secured a license and was married by a local clergyman to a maid only in her sixteenth year. The amorous groom made two serious mistakes. He failed to secure the consent of either of the parents to marriage to their fifteen year old daughter, and he took the affidavit required upon the issuance of a license as to the age of the bride, adding three or four years to her real age. As soon as the mother of the girl heard of the marital event she interviewed the Police Magistrate and urged that the law be put into force. Tearful entreaties on the part of the bride and humble overtures for forgiveness by the groom softened the mother heart. Next day, accompanied by the newly married juveniles, the Police Magistrate was again visited, and this time he was informed that both the father and mother had consented to the marriage if they could be legally married. The magistrate gave the young fellow wholesome advice respecting the matter of affidavits and the party then left his office. It is now reported that the marriage ceremony was performed the second time with the consent of the parents, and that everything is now on a satisfactory basis.

GROOMING YOUR HORSE

Why and How to Give the Animal a Rub Down.

It Keeps the Skin and Coat Clean and Improves the Appearance—Bacilliary White Diarrhoea of Chicks.

(Contributed by Ontario Department of Agriculture, Toronto.)

HORSES are groomed for the purpose of keeping the skin and coat clean, and incidentally improving the general appearance. The skin consists of two parts, viz., the dermis or corium which forms the deep layer, which is plentifully supplied with both blood vessels and nerves, and the epidermis or cuticle which is external and has neither blood nor nerve supply; hence is nonvascular and insensitive and serves as a protective covering for the dermis. It consists of a layer of agglutinated cells which are formed on the surface of the dermis.

In the tissue immediately underneath the dermis are large numbers of sudoriferous or sweat glands, each of which is surrounded by a quantity of fat. These glands are round bodies, each of which consists of one or more small tubes coiled into a ball; the free end of the tube opens on the surface by a funnel-shaped orifice.

The skin of the horse is characterized by its great sensitiveness, which is still further promoted by good grooming. Few animals, if any, perspire as freely as the horse.

As stated, the cells of the epidermis are formed by the dermis. This formation of cells is continuous, as is also the exfoliation of the cells of the external surface of the epidemis. The hair prevents the free escape of these scales, hence there is a tendency to accumulation; the coat also gathers dust, etc., from the surroundings, and if the animal is not groomed the coat soon becomes filled with the accumulation, which becomes damp when the animal perspires. It is claimed that this has a tendency to occlude the openings of the sweat glands, hence interfere with free perspiration. Whether or not there is much force to this contention, it is an undisputed fact that the horse that is regularly and well groomed looks better, feels better and gives more satisfactory service than his mate under the same conditions less the grooming. The object of grooming is to remove the scales, dust, dried perspiration and other foreign substances regularly. In order to do this a curry comb of some nature must be used, that when being worked by the hand, both with and against the grain of the hair, will agitate the hair to its exit from the skin, thereby loosening all foreign substances. The comb should not have teeth sufficiently sharp to scarify or irritate the skin. Then a stiff brush should be used to remove all foreign matter that has not escaped during the use of the comb. When the coat is quite short the use of the comb is not necessary, the stiff brush being sufficient. A finer brush, the bearing surface of which consists of bristles should now be used to remove anything that still remains, after which the whole surface of the body should be well rubbed with a clean linen cloth. The tail and mane should be well brushed with the stiff brush and then combed with combs designed for the purpose.

It is well, under ordinary conditions, to groom a horse well twice daily. If a horse has perspired freely it is good practice to rub him well with cloths until he becomes dry. If this be neglected he should be groomed to remove the dried perspiration and other accumulations before he is fixed for the night, as under such conditions he doubtless rests better.—Dr. J. H. Reed, O. A. College, Guelph.

A little daughter of Wm Freeman's at Wasaga Beach was stung by a bee on her finger and the swelling spread to her face, which became purple. When a physician arrived he pronounced it a very uncommon occurance and might have proved fatal. It seems that a nerve had been struck by the sting and the little girl suffered terribly, but is all right now.
