Miss Macphail Won Debate in Hart House, Toronto

Female Emancipation Was Subject of Debate on Wednesday Last

At Hart House, Toronto, the University men's stronghold, where no woman has ever set foot before, Miss A. C. Macphail, M. P., stormed the portals on Wednesday evening of last week in debate on the subject that female emancipation has not justified its promises. Miss Macphail was supported in her arguments by a young man and were so far effective that the judges awarded Miss Macphail's point of view, the negative the decision by a score of 127 to 21. Miss Macphail's speech was reported by the Toronto Daily Star as follows:

"I am sensible to the high honor done me," said Miss Macphail. "The first speaker said that all women got out of politics is the chance to choose between two crooks. Well she has had pleanty of practice. In the whole debate you see clearly the superiority complex of the male. The woman who keeps one eye open wider than the other is a wise woman. She is winking at men's oddities."

As for the "woman's place is the home" theory, she said: "I take it to be. She could not see that in the intrusion of beauty into the library the male undergraduates had a real grievance. "I should think the appreciation of beauty was one of the greatest aims of education."

She did not think that woman had yet been emancipated. It is a process that is not yet completed and will not be so until the enancipation of humanity is completed, and that will not be until personal rights replace the property rights as the basis of society, she said.

She recited a list of woman's wrongs not yet righted. Woman did not get equal pay for equal work. Nor did they get equal honor. In handing out political honors in England they made men dukes but did not make women duchesses. If a woman in Canada married an alien she lost her citizenship. A woman could not establish a legal domicile for a divorce. The supreme court of Canada had declared that women are not "persons." All the laws of the countries were based on that theory.

Man had always done his best to suppress the superior type of woman who might rival him and refuse to obey him. "Through the ages man has chosen the kittenish, soft, clinging, pliable type which made it easy for him to hold the place his superiority complex told him he should have." Twisting the views of the founder of Christianity as St. Paul had done, the Christain religion had taught for long centuries of woman's slavery that "man was made for the glory of God, but woman for the glory of man."

Women Who Count

"How can the great masses of women be free," she asked, 'when they have no economic independence? There are two classes of women whose absence from the home no one gets excited about. Those are charwomen and society women. It is when the middle class women who are the mothers of our most intelligent citizens leave the home that an outcry is made.'

She said in conclusion of a speech that had more argument and just as much wit as the undergraduate funsters. "If there was a promise in woman's emancipation, it was that she would put human rights above property rights. Woman's effort along this line has been encouraging, for instance, in child welfare, education, and the movement for peace. With the current of public opinion, I am not ashamed of her record."

It was neither Miss Macphail's debating superiority or that gallery threat that made many debaters reverse themselves when it came to voting. Man after man boasted of the superiority at the political, social economic and mental fiasco of emancipated woman. They searched the modern world vainly for one superior woman. And yet after Miss Mcphail spoke they succumbed. These masculine wits, despite their boasted logic fell victims to the fallacy of the one instance.
