[illegible]e Massacre at Michillimackinac

[illegible](Concluded from last week)

[illegible]he [illegible]ing morning was warm and [illegible]ry. [illegible]s the fourth of June, the [illegible]hday [illegible]ing George. The discipline [illegible]he gar[illegible] was relaxed, and some [illegible]ce [illegible]red to the soldiers. En[illegible]ped in [illegible] woods, not far off, were a [illegible]e num[illegible] of Objibwas, lately arrived; [illegible]le sev[illegible]ands of the Sac Indians, [illegible] the[illegible]ver Wisconsin, had also [illegible]ted [illegible] lodges in the vicinity. [illegible]ater[illegible] in [illegible]morning, many Objibwas [illegible]ame to [illegible]fort, inviting officers and [illegible]ldiers [illegible]e out and see a grand [illegible]me of which was to be played [illegible]tween [illegible]ation and the Sacs. In [illegible]sequ[illegible]e place was soon deserted [illegible]y half [illegible]enants. An outline of [illegible]hilline, as far as tradition has [illegible]ser[illegible]eral features, has already been giv[illegible] it is easy to conceive, with suffi[illegible]curacy, the appearance it must h[illegible]ented on this eventful morning. [illegible]ouses and barracks were so [illegible]anged[illegible]orm a quadrangle, enclosing a[illegible]ive area, upon which their doo[illegible]ned, while behind rose the tall p[illegible]forming a large external square. SERUM TO PROTECT [illegible]

To Safeguard Animals From Foot and Mouth Disease.

A Berlin despatch says: Professor Loeffler, of Grelfswald, has sent in a report to the Government on the results of his investigation of the foot and mouth disease among cattle. He says that a means has been found to protect the animals while in stables from contamination by the use of small doses of serum. He advises the inoculation of all cattle bought on the market, and he says if they are treated with the serum they are safe from infection.

SAILING OVER LONDON.

Many Thousands Watch Aeronaut's Trip.

A London despatch says: On Thursday afternoon, many thousands of home-going business men stopped in the streets, and the roofs of buildings were crowded with spectators watching the long-projected attempt of Spencer, the aeronaut, to sail his airship from the Crystal Palace in Sydenham around St. Paul's Cathedral and over miles of the densely built portion of South London. He started at 3.30 from the roof of an office building. His airship was a great cigar-shaped vessel of yellow silk, with a pendant car containing the propeller. Spencer's movements were easily visible to the crowd below.

confusion. At the outset, several strong hands had fastened their grip upon Etherington and Leslie, and led them away from the scene of massacre towards the woods. Within the area of the fort, the men were slaughtered without mercy. But here the task of description may well be resigned to the pen of the trader, Henry.

"I did not go to see the match which was now to be played without the fort, because, there being a canoe prepared to depart on the following day for Montreal, I employed myself in writing letters to my friends. I heard an Indian war-cry, and a noise of general confusion.

"Going instantly to my window, I saw a crowd of Indians, within the fort, furiously cutting down and scalping every Englishman they found; in particular, I witnessed the fate of Lieutenant Jamette.

"I had, in the room in which I was, a fowling-piece, loaded with swan shot. This I immediately seized, and held it for a few minutes, waiting to hear the drum beat to arms. In this dreadful interval I saw several of my countrymen fall, and more than one struggled between the knees of an Indian, who, holding him in this manner, scalped him while yet living.

"At length, disappointed in the hope of seeing resistance made to the enemy, and sensible, of course, that no effort of my own unassisted arm could avail against four hundred Indians, I thought only of seeking shelter amid the slaughter which was raging. I observed many of the Canadian inhabitants of the fort calmly looking on, neither opposing the Indians nor suffering injury; I conceived a hope of finding security in their houses.

"Betwe[illegible]n the yard door of my own house and that of M. Langlade, my next neighbor, there was only a low fence, over which I easily climbed. At my entrance, I found the whole family at the window, gazing at the scene of blood before them. I addressed myself immediately to M. Langlade, begging that he would put me into some place of safety until the heat of the affair should be over; an act of charity by which he might, perhaps, preserve me from the general massacre; but while I uttered my petition, M. Langlade, who had looked for a moment at me, turned again to the window, shrugging his shoulders, and intimating that he could do nothing for me.

"This was a moment of despair; but the next a Pani woman, a slave of M. Langlade's, beckoned me to follow her. She brought me to a door which she opened, desiring me to enter, and telling me that it led to the garret, which I must go and conceal myself. I joyfully obeyed her directions; and she, having followed me, locked it after me, and, with great presence of mind, took away the key.

"This shelter obtained, if shelter I could hope to find it, I was naturally anxious to know what might still be passing without. Through an aperture, which afforded me a view of the area of the fort, I beheld, in shapes the foulest and most terrible, the ferocious triumphs of barbaric conquerors. The dead were scalped and mangled; the dying were writhe-ing and shrieking under the unsatiated knife and tomahawk; and from the bodies of some, ripped open, their butchers were drinking the blood, scooped up in the hollow of joined hands, and quaffed amid shouts of rage and victory. I was shaken not only with horror, but with fear. The sufferings which I witnessed I seemed on the point of experiencing. No long time tomahawks, and all besmeared with blood, upon every part of their bodies.

"The die appeared to be cast. I could scarcely breathe; but I thought the throbbing of my heart occasioned a noice loud enough to betray me. The Indians walked in every direction about the garret; and one of them approached me so closely, that, at a particular moment had he put forth his hand, he must have touched me. Still I remained undiscovered."

The Indians after a time went away, but Henry put in a night of extreme anxiety, expecting their return any moment. Here he remained all the next day in hiding and following night. The second morning Langlade, fearing the Indians, delivered Henry to their tender mercies. He was seized by one Wenniway, who raised a large knife as if to slay him, but dropped his hand, and adopted Henry to replace a broth[illegible]r he had lost in the war. He was left in Langlade's charge in the mea[illegible]ntime. Later an Indian who owe[illegible] Henry tried to murder him but was frustrated. That night the Indians were all drunk. After some days of harrowing experiences, Wawatam appeared on the scene and claimed Henry from the chief, Minnavavana, in a most wonderful speech which Henry reproduces. Wawatam's request was acceded to and Henry passed the following winter with his preserver on his hunting ground in northern Michigan, afterwards finding his way to Montreal. The complete story is told by Henry is thrilling in the extreme. We have condensed about one half of it.

WEDDING BELLS

On Thursday evening last a very happy event took place at the residence of Mrs. Gilliland, when the bonds were united in the bonds of matrimony Miss Clara Gilliland and Mr. John Hargrave of the gravel road. Mr. Joseph Davidson, cousin of the bride, gave her away. Miss Ida Osborne played the wedding march. Miss Broomilaw of Banda was maid of honor. Mr. Thomas. Gilliland, the bride's brother, brother, assisted the groom. After the ceremony and the usual congratulations the guests adjourned to the dining room where a handsome spread awaited them. There were one hundred and fifty invitations given, so a most happy party was assembled and enjoyed a very pleasant time. The groom's present to the bride was a beautiful gold watch and chain. A large number of handsome presents were received by the young couple, which shows the high esteem in which they were held by a large circle of friends, as the fair bride was one of our most popular young ladies, and will be greatly missed at our [illegible]ings at Eugenia. The many [illegible] young couple their [illegible] them a long life.

Turks Said to Torture Political Prisoners.

A London despatch says: The correspondent of the Daily Mail at Monastir describes the underground cells in the prisons there used for political prisoners. They are so low that the inmates cannot even sit; they must lie down. Water is poured into the cells. Food is withheld for three days together, and the air passages are stopped to force the prisoners into confessions of complicity with the revolutionaries. Many have died under this treatment.
