INFLUENZA

During an epidemic, most people are anxious to secure information as to how to protect themselves from the particular disease which happens to be epidemic at that time. There are fewer epidemics now than there used to be because we have learned how to prevent certain diseases, which, not so many years ago, were the cause of epidemics. The early settlers in this country had the sad experience of repeated epidemics of cholera and typhus fever, or, as the latter was called, ship's fever or immigrant fever. .Until recent years, epidemics of tyhpoid fever were common. These diseases rarely cause epidemics now because our public health organization wages a successful war against them, providing the necessary equipment with which to fight is available.

We are not successful in the same measure in preventing epidemics of such diseases as influenza, because as yet the cause of this disease is not definitely known; nor have we a means of making ourselves immune or resistant to influenza in the way we can, through vaccination, render ourselves immune to smallpox.

All the advice given in regard to influenza may be put in a few words —live a hygienic life, and if you become ill, go to bed and call in your family doctor. This advice is perfectly sound. Our reason for referring to it is that it is important that it be understood that if we are to protect ourselves at the time of an influenza epidemic, we must establish and live a hygienic life at all times. We say this because we believe it is practically impossible to alter our mode of living suddenly. We should for example, wash our hands before eating; we should never put our hands to our faces excepting to use a handkerchief; we should not put anything into our mouths, excepting food and drink, or toothbrush. The reason for these habits is to keep disease germs out of the mouth—the common mode of entrance. Such habits cannot be suddenly estabished during an epidemic. Practise them at all times and you will do them unconsciously, and so protect yourself, during and between epidemics, from some of the dangers of infection.
