THE KING'S CAR

As a motorist, King George sets an example in economy. Many people imagine that the King has only to desire [illegible] one appears. The re[illegible] is by [illegible] the [illegible] have been met [illegible] very little margin for [illegible] whims. The King's last car was in constant use for over fifteen years. Indeed it was only due to his anxiety to encourage industry that he gave way to the representations made to him and ordered a new one. The buying of the royal car is by no means the simple task it sounds, and it is not merely a matter of going into a large show room and chosing a model. A full-size plan is first drawn on a wall for the King's inspection. Now that the stage coach is rarely used for ceremonial occasions, apart from the opening of parliament, many features of the gilded coach have to be incorporated into the design of the royal car The windows are made exceptionally large, so that the public can see their majesties during processions. The height of the car too, must be sufficient to allow the King to wear the tall head-dresses that State occasions demand. Spare wheels are fixed on the side of the hood. The King's car does not bear a registration number plate, but carries instead a shield bearing the Royal Standard in the day time. At night a distinguishable blue light is used to enable the police to afford it precedence.
