VARICOSE VEINS

The blood is carried throughout the body by the arteries, and is brought back to the heart by the veins. The blood current in the veins is much more slow than it is in the arteries, and from the lower part of the body, the flow in the veins is uphill. For these reasons, it is not difficult to check or interfere with the flow in the veins, particularly those of the lower part of the body.

Varicose veins are enlarged veins. Enlargement of the veins occurs when, for one reason or another, the flow of blood through the veins is sufficiently checked to cause the veins to become distended. If the distension is severe, or if it is repeated, the veins become permanently enlarged and lose their normal shape and condition.

The legs and rectum are the parts of the body where varicose veins are most commonly found. Constriction of the legs by tight garters may be responsible. A tumor in the pelvis, a bowel that is overloaded as a result of constipation, or pregnancy may cause pressure on the veins in the pelvis and bring about enlargement of the veins.

Certain forms of heart disease, in which the flow of blood is not normal, may act as a cause of varicose veins. Again, if the tissue surrounding the veins is not healthy, the veins may not have proper support, and, as a result, they become distended.

Long standing, which causes the blood to stagnate in the lower part of the body, predisposes to the occurrence of varicose veins, as does overweight, which calls for extra force to circulate the blood through the excessive amount of tissue.

In order to prevent varicose veins, normal weight should be mtaintained. The muscles of the body should, by regular exercise, be kept in good condition to support the veins. Those who are required to stand for long hours may be helped by lying down each evening and having their legs gently massaged from the feet to the hips.

Constipation is the most common cause of varicose veins of the rectum, which are called haemorrhoids or piles. Prevention of these lies in the avoidance of constipation through proper toilet habits, diet and exercise. Constipation cannot be corrected by cathartics; in fact, the cathartic habit is one of the most frequent causes of constipation, and so leads to haemorrhoids.

It is much easier and more satisfactory to prevent varicose veins than it is to cure them. Once the condition has developed, relief may be secured through proper treatment, but in all cases, the cause of the condition must be removed or a relapse will occur.

Keep the muscles healthy and the weight normal, and avoid constipation if you would escape varicose veins.
