Home Curing of Pork

In the home curing of pork either the "dry salt" or the "brine" method may be employed, but whchever process is adopted common salt is the curing agent. Such other ingredients as sugar, salt-petre, and baking soda are also used. As a rule, the old fashioned brown sugar is preferred to the white granulated kind as it is belived to give a slightly better flavour to the meat. A small quantity of salt-petre has a preservative effect and gives a reddish colour to the meat. Baking soda is used principally with the brine cure.

Curing pork should be cut up into convenient sizes, and it is important on the one hand, that all animal heat has ben coled out of the feat, and, on the other hand that the meat is not frozen when the curing is commenced. A oool, well-ventilated cellar is a desirable place for both brine and dry curing. The curing is more easily controlled in cold, or at least cool, weather, so that thick pieces may not have a chance to spoil before the salt has penetrated.
