Roland stood before her, as if unable to digest the news; his meuth open, his eyes staring. "It is not true!" he shrieked.

"Indeed, it is perfectly true. I gathered a suspicion of it from William Yorke's manner to-day, and I put the question plainly to Miss Chamning herself. 'Had they parted in consequence of this business of Arthur's?' She acknowledged that it was so."

Roland turned white with honest acknowledged that it was so."

Roland turned white with honest anger. He dashed his hair from his brow, where the moisture stood in drops, like peas. And with an ugly word, which would be more ugly still if written, he dashed down the stairs four at a time, and flung out of the house; probably with the intention of having a little personal explosion with the Reverend William Yorke.

CHAPTER XXIX.

The closters of Heistonleigh were echoing with the sounds of a loud dispute, according as little with their sacred character, as with the fair beauty of the summer's afternoon.

The excitement caused in the college

The excitement caused in the college school by the rumour of Lady Augusta Yorks's having obtained the premise of the head master that her son should be promoted to the seniorship over the heads of Channing and Huntley, had been smouldering ominously, and gathering all the more strength from the very fact that the boys appeared to be powerless in it. Powerless they were, in spite of Tom Channing's boast at the dimner-table, that the school would not stand it tamely, and his meaning nod when Hamish had mockingly inquired whether the school intended to send Lady Augusta a challenge, or to recommend Mr. Pye to the surveillance of the deast.

nomal compliments, rather tending to break the peace, had been exchanged. The senior boy held himself aloof from acting personally; it was his place they were fighting for. Tom Channing and Huntley were red-hot against what they called the "sneaking," meaning the underhand work. Gerald Yorks was equally hot for non-interference, either to the master or the dean. Yorke processed it was not in the least true protested it was not in the least true that I ady Augusta had been promised any thing of the sort. In point of fact, there was no proof that she had, except her own assertion, made in her hearing of Jenkina. Gerald gravely declared that Jenkina had gone to sleep and dreamt it.

Affairs had been going on in a cross-grained sort of manner all day. The school, taking it as a whole, had been institutive: Mr. Pye had been severe:

now William Yorke has got bread and cheese, and a house to eak it in," returned Roland, throwing himself at full length on a sefa.

"Then you expect wrong," answered Lady Augusta. "If Miss Channing leaves, it will be at my disminsal. And I am not sure but I shall do it," ahe added, nodding her head.

"What for!" asked Roland, lasily.

"It is not pleasant to retain, as instructrees to my children, one whose brother is a thief."

Roland tumbled off the sofa, and rose up with a great cry—a cry of passionate anger, of aroused indignation.

"What ? he thundered.

"God gracious! are you going mad?" uttaced the lady. "What is Arthur Channing to you, that you had best not try it on again," "You had best not try it on again," "Treaurset, Mr. A. McLeod, $20 for his difficient and able services.

Hurst to Yorke.

"Keep yours shut first," retorted Yorke to Hurst. "Not being interested there's no need to open yours at all."

"Let's see the thing," said Huntley. Brittle drew from his pocket a sheet of a copy-book, tumbled, blotted, scribbled upon with the elegance that only that might have brought down the roof, had it been glass. "I'd scorn such wicked injustice."

"If I were you, I'd 'scorn' putting myself into these fiery tempers, upon short of what Hurst had figuratively short of what Hurst had figuratively short of what Hurst had figuratively short of several heads in our comfort and welfare. WHITBY RAILWAY EXTENSION. The adjourned meeting of municipal delegates appointed to consider the propriety of extending the Whitby Railway to the Georgian Bay, was held at Cannington on Wednesday. The meeting was organized by appointing M. Gillespie, Esq., reeve of Brock, and W. H. Higgins, of the Whitby Chronicle, Secretary. From the Chronicle's report we learn that there was quite a large attention. tary. From the Chronicle's report we learn that there was quite a large attendance of outsiders from the village and neighborhood, and also from Sunderland and other points. The Nipissing Railway Company ran a special train and issued free passes to a number of gentlemen from Uxbridge who attended in the interest of that Company. From the town of Whitby there were present Messrs. J. Ham Perry and Chester Draper; from Rama, the Reeve, Mr. McDermott; from Thorah, Messrs. Chas. Robinson and Chas.
