What Causes Death

When medical science knows more definitely what takes place when a person dies and when death approach-se it is expected that still further progress can be made in sustaining life. This is one of the objectives of those who are experimenting with the use of electro-cardiographs in cases of apparent drowning, electric shock and carbon monoxide poisoning.

It has been proved conclusively that a suspended state of animation can so resemble death that ordinary methods will fail to discover life. The result has been that thousands of persons have been taken from the water and declared dead too soon, artificial respiration being discontinued long before such efforts might have proved successful if carried on.

This knowledge—coupled with the fact that there are nearly a thousand cases of accidental drownings every year in Canada—prompted the organization by Dr. Gordon Bates, General Director of the Health League of Canada, of a group of experts to study the subject.

Sir Frederick Banting and others have been actively at work to discover more facts concerning the suspension of animation. As a contribution to this study as well as to the possibility of saving more lives, the harbor authorities are co-operating by prompt notification of the committee when accidents occur. In other parts of the country, too, the publicity given the movement has had the effect of a more general summoning of medical aid and longer sustained efforts of resuscitation.

The portable electro-cardiograph was used for the first time at Hamilton recently. Unfortunately, in that case, which was one of electrocution, the device proved that the victim was dead. It is hoped that a wider use will be found for it as it is believed by the experts here that it will prove, in many cases an encouragement of greater efforts in artificial respiration.

You can always pick out a good spot for fishng by the number of empty bottles lying around.
