Poetrn

The Song of War. ton have chanted and sung, and gitbly th tongue,
Itath told of my fearful power,
And sounded my praise; in poems and lays,
To hasten my battle hour;
Tis all very well to sing and to tell,
By the light of their ingle fires,
But a different tale is the anguish and wail
Where the wrotch in my red arms expires

In true I may seem a glorious theme
In their homestead far away,
With my legions so bold in searlet and gold
All drawn up in battle array;
But little they know of the horror and wee,
Where my flames blot out the sun,
Of the recking blade and the havee made,
Of the widow and fatherless one. Oh! the earth I shake, and the nations quake. When my banner I raise on high, when I seize the brand with bloodered hand, Fale mercy fites shricking by; With sulpherous breath I send forth death, And nature shrinketh aghast, Fear, rapine, and rack I bring in my track, Itell triumphs to hear my blast.

Oh! I love to see, with flead-like glee, My ruthless victims bound With flerce despair from their blood-stain hair,

And hard destruction round!
From my crimson car I shout Ha! Ha!
This, this is the sport for me!
And laugh at the yell of their last farewell,
As they sink in their agony.

With empty fame and glory's name,
I ture thom to their fate,
I dazzle their eyes with the glittering prize,
And they grasp at the glitted buit;
With trumpet and fife they meet the strife,
So I uge their wild career.
But the shrich and the groun, and the dying

In the music I love to hear. Then pause and think ere ye break the link That keeps me fettered down, five ye spread with dearth the smiling earth before my terrible frown: When I rise in my might I wither and blight, All horrors in me combine, and never, I ween, was heard or seen, So fearful a curse as mine.

THE SILVER MINE IN THE OZARK MOUNTAINS.

(Concluded) With active steps and without utter-ing another word, the elder now walked in front, and Thompson, eleverly perceiving, that his more experienced comrade was in the right, followed him, only now was in the right, followed him, only now and then, when he stepped on a very sharp stone, assauging his pain by a half suppressed curse.

They had advanced in this way for nearly an hour; and the moon poured its silvery rays on the forcet, when Preston stopped, pointing before him, whispered to his companion that this was the oiserbed, and he fancied he heard the sound of a hell.

of a hell.

The fine, pure tones of a few small bells now distinctly reached the car through the sileace of night, and the men stopped to discuss their future movements.

"Are they on the right or left bank of the river?" Thompson gently asked his comrade, who was listening attentively to the sound of the bells, in order to discover how many animals they had with them on this occasion.

'On the right,' Preston whispered; 'at least their foot marks have already been on that side. But,' he suddenly turned the conversation, 'only listen, how many hells can you hear? They seem to me five or siz.'

with great attention, they now both listened to the mixed sounds which reached them from the valley, till Thompson at last broke the silence, and gently muttered to himself that he certainly heard four different bells.

tered to himself that he certainly heard four different bells.

'I fancy there are five,' roplied Preston, equally gently.

'Well, hang it, let them be ten,' Thompson said angrily, 'we are here now, and it will make no difference about a couple of Spaniards more or less; we are standing on Uncle Sam's ground, and if the strangers, infease they discover us, have hostile designs, they must blame themselves if we are liberal with our lead. But what have you got there?' he said to his companion, who was stooping down and exefully examining the ground.

'A footmark, as true as I am alive, and belonging to a booted foot?' Preston cried, 'they must have gone up here.'

'Hist!' whispered Thompson, seizing his arm holding it firmly,' I hear steps' They both listened with fixed attention, and the sound of a man walking slowly towards them became more and more distinct.

towards them became more and more distinct.

They laid themselves on the ground behind some scattered masses of rock, and awaited the figure, which, wrapped in a long, brown cloak, and the head covered with broad-leaved, black sombrero, slowly scaled the terrace at whose edge the hunters lay, then halted, and looked around cautiously for about five minutes, and then uttered a gentle though distant cry, in imitation of an owl.

It was answered once from the thicket, and after this all was silent as the grave for half an hour; then the same cry sounded again from the valley. The sentinel—for the tall dark figure that leaned against a tree and listened for the slightest noise could be nothing else—answered as on the previous occasion, then welked down the path by which he had come, and in a few minutes, when his steps had died away in the distance, the whole neighborhood was as quiet and descreted as if it never had been descerated by a human foot.
