BY ETTA. (Continued from last week.)

One evening when Percy called to see Vivian the servant announced to him that Miss Lake was entertaining Mr. St. Clair in the parlor. He stood for some moments and then remarked that as Miss Lake had company he would not remain. When Vivian heard that Percy had called and had gone away without seeing her she was somewhat surprised at such conduct from one she thought would bear with her firtations without showing the least sign of his displeasure. As Percy wended his way nomeward his thoughts were continually resting on the girl who had elx months ago promised to be his bride. His heart was filled with sorrow-for he had a love for Vivian which words cannot express. When he entered the house his grief was lamentable. He thought of her for whose happiness he would have sacriflord his all. He sat in deep meditation for some time; and he began to think that things could not go on any longer as at present. exclaim. Presently he came to the conclusion that he would send a note to her inquiring the cause of such conduct. Early next morning he wrote to her :

MISS VIVIAN LARE. Dasy Vivian.-I write to you for an explanation of such conduct as for an explanation of such conduct as I have found you to be guilty of. Dear Vivian, do you consider it prudent to be entertaining young men evening after evening, or has your love grown cold; or have I been unfaithful to you in any way? Oh! my love, have you forgotten that we are engaged? My heart is almost broken at your coldness to me. I called on you last evening; you did not some to meet me as you usually sibility of a married life. We wish Mr. and Mrs. Anderson a long and prosperous union. betrothed. I send this note with the

She tore open the enrelope, and when she read the conients of the letter she saw that Percy was not to be triffed with any more, The tears began to roll down her shooks. It was more than she could bear, to think the man she loved would be so cruel. She did not even think of her own selfehness; of the pain she had caused others. At last she got quieted, and began to think what she would say. Would she ask his forgiveness? "But no!" she exclaimed, "I am not going to be domineered over by Percy Vermont. Why could be not trust me? I have done nothing that he should use so much sareaem in writing to me. Presently she perceived the post boy was waiting for an answer. She sat down and wrote these lines:

MR. PERCY VERMONT. I received your note. Feel deeply indebted to you for your kindness. If my conduct does not suit you I don't feel inclined to change it at present, as I cannot see that I have done anything imprudent or given you the slightest offence, and therefore I cannot take such an insult from you. I do not feel like humbling myself by saying anything more to you. From

Oh the sorrow and pain she felt as she sealed the envelope that so near sealed her doom. Little did she think that Percy would reject her in the future; but the haughty, proud spirit would not submit, even though it should break her heart. She thought he would come again; but no, he was a spirited, truthful and noble boy, who could not bear anything based on deseit.

It was just dark when Percy reselved Vivian's letter. He read it over and over. "She does not feel inclined to change her conduct." Perhaps Willie St. Clair has found a place in her heart. I can never look into her face. Buch a heartless girl; but O, so beautiful! My own Vivian, why have you rejected me ! What have I done that you, whom I thought were perfect, should treat me so? How can I stay and see the cruel heartless and selfish girl who ornel, heartless and selfish girl who has treated me so? I will leave this city and wander abroad, and try if I can drown my trouble in travelling. Perhaps I can forget her; or per haps I can find some one who is more considerate about my feelings.

On Monday morning he had his trunks packed for the continent of Europe', and before moon it was rumored through the town that Vivian Lake nad broken her engagement with Mr. Vermont, and that it had taken such effect on him that he could not stay and see her pass him day after day, seemingly so happy in company of others, while in reality her heart was breaking. So six o'clock that evening found Percy on his way to Switzerland. Now it had always been his ambition to go on a sketching tour; but since he had been paying such devoted attention to Vivian all his thoughts had centred on her, and he scarcely thought of anything but Vivian and
