Don't Forget Water For Working Horses

Most farmers know that it is not a good idea to let a horse fill up with water after eating. But few horses if given a good drink before their meal will drink much afterward.

When horses are being worked in the field it is an advantage to have some means of giving them a drink several times during the morning and afternoon. It is better for both their health and usefulness.

No elaborate set-up is required to give a horse a drink during the day's work. Some farmers merely hitch their team to a stone boat place a half- barrel of water on it, and haul this load directly to a shady place in the field. At noon, when the remainder of the water has become warm, they haul the drag back to the barnyard and refill the barrel with fresh water. The horses have to be driven back to the barn at noon anyway and it takes only a moment to hitch them to the stoneboat and fill the barrel with water. Then, too, if the farmer happens to be feeling a bit tired he can hop on the boat for a free ride.

But the main advantage of toting water on a stoneboat or on anything that can be drawn is that a farmer can then refresh his horses in the very place were they most appreciate a drink, in the field.

The best way to entertain a person is to start him talking about himself and then pretend to listen.
