Atom Blast A Big Test For Cameras

Every Precaution Being Taken To Protect Photographers And Equipment

When the Army and Navy explode atom bombs on the Pacific atoll, photography will be literally and figuratively on the spot. Hundreds of cameras will be focused on the bomb tests and thousands of exposures will be made — to record on film the atomic blast that will influence every living thing on this planet.

Will photography be able to stand the test? What new discoveries in atomic power will it record? Large numbers of automatic cameras will operate—and radio-controlled robot planes will carry robot cameras right into the edge of the explosion area.

Protection For Cameras

So intense will be the light that will blaze over the Pacific—and so intense the heat and radio-active effect—that extraordinary precautions are being taken to protect photographers, film and cameras alike. Batteries of cameras are to be mounted on top of 100-foot steel towers on several islands five to ten miles away from the target ships in the Bikini atoll, Marshall islands.

To protect the cameras, rooms with thick lead walls are being constructed in the towers. Inside the lead rooms, the cameras will be additionally protected by airtight waterproof boxes. Even the portholes will be shielded with lead. They will remain open until the flash goes off, the portholes will close automatically before the outward spreading wave of radioactivity reaches the towers. Radioactive waves will be turned back by the lead sheathing.

No photographers will be in the towers—the cameras will be started by radio from a distant ship—and it may be several weeks after each test before any human being will be able to approach them, because of radio-activity.

"Freckles" on Films

In the first pictures which were released to the public after the New Mexico atom bomb test, big "freckles" — big black spots — showed up against the [illegible]ge of the explosion.

U.S. camera magazines, after asking the Army and its photographers what caused them, published the very interesting explanation a few issues ago: Although the cameras which took these pictures were shielded in concrete dugouts six miles away, the heat of the explosion, focused through the lens, was so great that it literally blistered the film. These blister spots showed up huge "freckles". This time photographers hope special equipment will prevent a recurrence of these atomic blisters.

SPOTS OF SPORTS

By FRANK MANN HARRIS
("A Six Bit Critic")

Back home again in England after a brief look at the skyline of New York — particularly that of Madison Square Gardens — Mr. Bruce Woodcock states that he feels that he would have won if it hadn't been for a butt in the head received in a clinch. Well, far be it from us to disagree with Mr. Woodcock, who was much closer to the scene of action than we, and in a better position to know what went on.

Even in these times when speedy air travel has become such a commonplace, it seemed rather strange to read of Woodcock being back in London less than 48 hours after listening to the account of him fighting in New York. But this business of being able to make a speedy getaway should give present-day overseas fighters a great advantage over their brethern of just a few years back. They should be able to take home at least some small fraction of the money won—which is more than a lot of the old-timers were ever able to do.

Still, we wouldn't be too sure of that. The inside story of how much actual cash boxers get to personally handle and pocket out of the fortunes they earn would be almost incredible if they weren't so common; and when you hear of some fighter, who made hundreds of thousands in the ring, being broke or dying penniless, it doesn't always follow that he was nothing but a Goodtime Charley, who tossed it to the winds with both hands. The chances are that he never had it in his hands to toss; for while the gentle art of "putting the bite" on a successful athlete is by no means confined to boxing circles, it is in those circles it has been brought closest to ultimate perfection, especially in and around New York City.

* * *

Now there's no doubt that boxfighting is a manly and character-building sport; at least it is according to the text-books, and who are we to go against them? But somehow or other it seems to have the power of attracting around it more creeping and crawling things, in human form, than any other pastime we know—including even horse-racing and playing the market, which is taking in quite a stretch of rich territory. In fact it is the environs of boxing that we are recommending as a wonderful potential market to a young chap we know who is working hard to perfect what should be an epoch-making new invention.

* * *

He calls this a "de-humanizer"—and says it is for the benefit of lice that are bothered with people.

* * *

We had always thought of the old saying "distance lends enchantment to the view" as applying to such situations as the dame who looks so wonderful across the street and who turns out to be considerably less glamorous when you get a close-up peek. But now it seems as if it applies to sports as well. For instance, in a recent issue of that widely-read family publication The Saturday Evening Post there is a story built around—of all things!—the sport of cock-fighting.

* * *

Now it was a very readable tale—even if bringing in a small boy and his mother as interested spectators of the battle did rather shock our old-fashioned sensibilities. But we couldn't help wondering just what would have been the reaction of The Editors if somebody had submitted to them a story about cock-fighting as practised—at least so we have heard—in such places as around the barns of Dufferin Park, Hamilton or Fort Erie Race Tracks or several other such localities we might mention.

* * *

However, the locale of the published story happened to be The Philipine Islands—and we take it that the eight thousand miles or so of distance between there and some of our Eastern race tracks purified and cast an enchantment over the sport, and made it fit for general reading. It's just one more of those things that are too much for us to understand.
