History Of Cigarettes

Although crude forms of cigarettes have been found in ancient ruins in Arizona, it was not until the middle of the 19th century that cigarettes were called "papelitos", says Dr. Norman A. MacRae, Chief, Tobacco Division Central Experimental Farm, Ottawa. This new way of consuming tobacco was naturally taken to Spain, and from there it made slow progress to neighbouring counries. But cigarettes did not gain any real recognition until after the Crimean war in 1856. The soldiers took to using this new form, because it was much easier and less expensive to "roll your own". They brought it back to there various countries where once again there was opposition, particularly in Germany, but the opposition this time was not against the use of tobacco but lay in the competitive popular cigar.

In England, cigarettes became the fashion rapidly, especially following the use of better grades of the other forms of tobacco, the cigarette went to North America. Today the tobacco industry, including the production of leaf and manufacture of tobacco products, has become one of Canada's greatest acheivements and a considerable proportion of the tobacco used for making cigarettes in Britain is imported from Canada.
