Your Local Newspaper Co-operative

The Canadian Statesman is the product of co-operation. Readers, advertisers, correspondents, editors and staff all work together to produce this weekly account of what is going on in Bowmanville and West Durham.

Readers not only pay the subscription price or the single copy price but frequently they bring or send in news for publication-news of themselves, their families, their friends.

Advertisers not only benefit themselves and their stores by using The Statesman's columns to tell the public about their wares, but they make possible a larger and more interesting newspaper than could be published if there were no advertising in it.

Correspondents of The Statesman receive little remuneration for all the work they do other than the satisfaction of contributing to the welfare of their communities and helping to produce a public-service district newspaper.

Editors and staff too try to contribute their best each week, but they realize that their work is only made possible by the contributions of advertisers, readers and correspondents.
