INCONSIDERATION COSTLY

Sidewalks may have to be provided along all rural highways at some time in the future. They would cost an enormous amount of money and probably would introduce a complicating factor into the problem of road improvement.

If sidewalks along rural roads are not to become imperative, a way will have to be found to protect pedestrians from motor speeders and road hogs. People afoot have equal rights on the roads with automobiles. Yet there are large numbers of drivers who ignore pedestrians' rights, imperil their safety and seem to take a delight in bespattering them with mud or covering them with dust.

Considerate drivers there are, but they appear to be few, and the walking on the public highways is in grave danger from the large number of inconsiderate ones.—Hanover Post
