Around Grey County

A movement is on foot towards the organization of a branch of the Humane Society in Owen Sound.

Mrs. Wm. Boyd, Sr., of Bentinck, an old lady over 90 years of age, fell on the floor of her home recently and sustained a fracture of the leg.

Sam Derbecker, a farmer near Ayton, accidentally shot himself in the hand while climbing up a ladder with his hand on the muzzle of the gun. He was after pigeons at the time.

Thomas Daniel was appointed town constable of Durham at the recent meeting of the council.

Particulars as to the death of the late Capt. Pollock have been received. It happened during the advance in front of Cambrai by a machine gun bullet in the stomach.

Grey County Council submitted a proposal to the Bruce Council to make the county line between the two counties as a county road. There will also be a county road between Owen Sound and Hepworth.

About twelve of the large tents of the 147th Battalion that were given to them by the County and used at Niagara and Camp Borden and various camps in England were returned home recently. Warden McQuaker was appointed to dispose of them immediately.

The Owen Sound Sun-Times denies that there are any cases of the "Black Itch" in that town as was rumored.

The Owen Sound Wire Fence Co. have shipped several cars of woven wire to Quebec.

Laura Beamish, of Dundalk, fell one day last week and had her leg broken.

Pte. Stanley Laycock, of Meaford, returned home recently after spending three years overseas. In 1916 he was reported killed in action, but fortunately there was no truth in the report.

The hearing of Joseph Weber has been postponed a week on account of the accused.

Our Loyal Indians

Father Cadot, Cape Croker, who was in town last week, is greatly pleased about the return of several of the boys of the Indian Reserve from overseas recently. Everyone of these lads is a friend of this genial padre, who has spent almost a lifetime in missionary work amongst the Indians. He has kept in touch with all who went overseas and is proud of their record.

Indeed the showing made by the Cape Croker Indians in the Great War will go down in the annals of local history. Fifty-three proceeded overseas. Six made the supreme sacrifice and twenty two were wounded. Nine are now returned to Canada and twelve are in the army of occupation now far across the Rhine. The remainder are either convalescing in England or en route for home. From coast to coast in 1916 the story of the enlistment from this small band was used in recruiting speeches and literature and their courage will not be soon forgotten.

OUR LIGNITE DEPOSITS.

Immediate Steps Will Be Taken to Utilize Them.

The order-in-council by which is created a Lignite Utilization Board for the Dominion of Canada will interest many citizens of our country. For many years past, it has been one of the anomalies of Canadian economics that whilst the Dominion has fuel resources second only to those of the United States, the greatest coal-producing country in the world, it imports, and always has imported, about fifty per cent. of its fuel. Most of this fuel is brought into the country over immense distances, unnecessarily absorbing labor and transport facilities urgently needed in other directions, and adding enormously to the cost of the fuel itself.

Long before the war, the absurdities of such a system were apparent to anyone who stopped to consider the matter, but the necessity for conservation in all directions imposed by the war has emphasized the need of a change, and has brought under the consideration of the authorities many schemes for the development of Canada's own fuel resources. Amongst the questions which have thus been forced to the front is the much discussed matter of the utilization of the Dominion's vast lignite deposits. In the original state, these deposits can be used only when freshly mined, and, even then, the lignite as it comes from the mines is not suited for household purposes. By a process of carbonizing, however, the material may be converted into a kind of coke or charcoal, which is readily briquetted. When thus treated, the resultant product is a fuel equal in heating value to anthracite, with the additional advantage that it may be sold at $7 a ton, and a just profit obtained from it at that price.

Some time ago, the committee appointed by the Government to inquire into the matter reported that the art of producing these carbonized briquettes had passed the laboratory stage; that no further information could be obtained from laboratory methods, and that the producer must face the question, often a very different one, of working out the results obtained in the laboratory on a large commercial scale, in other words putting theories to a practical test.

This is the great task which the Canadian Government has now undertaken, and the matter is to be pushed forward with energy. The Province of Saskatchewan, the balancing point for the fuel from the east and the west, has been chosen as the scene for the initial enterprise. After full investigation has been made of all the machines and processes at present available, the board will construct, or contract for, a plant of commercial size adjacent to the great lignite mines of Southern Saskatchewan, and will, at the earliest possible moment, begin to distribute the output through the ordinary channels of trade.

The whole question is, of course, very much a matter for the expert, but it cannot be doubted, by those who have given the matter any study, that a great future lies before such an industry. If the board can foresee the possibility of retailing the new fuel to-day at $7 a ton, before the great question of by-products has been fully studied, there is every prospect that the price in the future, when this has been done, will tend to be reduced rather than increased. The enormous value of the by-products from the manufacture of coal gas is, of course, largely responsible for the comparatively cheap rate at which coal gas may be sold, when municipally owned; and the same will, no doubt, apply to the briquetting of lignite.

A Tragic End.

James Stevenson, assistant electrician at the Macfarlane Engine Works, Paris, who had just returned from two years' war service, was instantly killed during his first week at work, by a metal ladder he was carrying touching a high potential wire.

On the Rhine In Hunland

The following excerpts are from letters recently written to his parents by Pte. Will Buchanan, son of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Buchanan. Will was with the army of occupation at Bonn :

We have been on the hike for four days, averaging fifteen miles per day, the last three days being spent in Germany. It was on Dec. 5 when we crossed the frontier from Belgium into Germany, and just at that point, on Belgian soil, we saw on our left a very pretty valley. Since then we have seen some very pretty scenery and have been climbing hills to no end. We have climbed so high that some of the lads think we have gone above the golden gate where St. Peter stands with the hooked stick. One hill we went up yesterday was a mile and a quarter long and a couple that we went up today were nearly a mile long. It certainly is a grand trip, but I would just as soon be excused, as I have seen easier jobs.

The people here in Germany treat us fairly well, but not so kindly as those in Belgium. They give us everything we want. I do not know whether they are afraid not to do so. One thing I know is that we will have it, anyway. Needless to say we have good billets, and from now till we leave the country we expect to have no more barn billets. I am writing this under a very nice electric light.

I wrote last week saying that we had crossed the border into Germany and I felt like saying that the farther we marched the less friendly we found the people, but since then my opinion has changed somewhat. Then the people did not seem very friendly, but at that time we were in the mountainous part of the country, where the people had none too much to live on. But now we are in the fertile plains of the Rhine river and in this district the people are better to do, better educated and more friendly towards us. Perhaps they have had a harder drilling by the Prussian spirit, but they do not act as if they treat us well through fear, but because they want to do so.

The night before last we had a fine billet in which lived two very nice looking young ladies who always gave us a pleasant smile when we went into the kitchen, and here in Godesberg we have a splendid billet, a schoolhouse that has been fitted up for a hospital, and thus we have real beds to sleep on. It is such a comfortable place that I am sorry we must leave tomorrow, when the Second Canadian Division will march in a body through Bonn, a city of eighty thousand inhabitants, and from there about eight miles to some town, where we will remain until the armistice is ended. Bonn will be our divisional headquarters, and the Division will be spread around in the different towns to do garrison duty, I suppose until we are relieved or until Germany's government is in working order. At present they are rather unsettled, so we are here to keep the peace.

Occasionally we meet some who can speak English. One we met this morning gave us to understand that they thought the kaiser was wholly to blame for the war. Which of course is what we thought all the time.

I forgot to say when I was mentioning the friendliness of the people that I often think of the commandment, "Love your enemies." I can assure you it would not be a difficult task to love some of the fairer ones. I have seen some very pretty fraileins—girls. Some of them speak English and French fairly well.

I am not particularly fond of the German customs, especially those of the men. For here the men take first place. The men go into the street cars, theatres etc. first and the men are the first to occupy the seats. Of course if there are some left for the women they can have them. A woman will get up and give a man her seat. Not so with regards to British soldiers, but with "civiemen." I suppose the women would give us their seats if we would take them. The man in the house where we now are seemed quite amused when he saw one of the lads scrubbing the floor of our room We are not allowed to make friends among these people.
