WHEN THE GREYS CAME HOME

The return of our first victorious soldiers last week was an unforgettable sight, and the fact that Flesherton and other Grey county heroes were in the number made it none the less so.

Toronto held her breath on Wednesday forenoon and nerved herself to do full

As the hour drew near the streets picked up their cordons of restless humanity and stretched them for miles. Many returned men—thousands of them—mingled with the others to welcome their comrades ; but they were the discards of the pack, thrown out of the game before the day of victory by an inscrutable fate.

At last with a blaze of torches, a blare of bands and a castanet chorus of horses hoofs, the gallant C. M. R.'s were escorted through the glad streets of Toronto.

Cheers rent the air, a hoarse throaty chorus—cheers for the lads who had brought the Hun to his knees and now have Canada at their feet. But many a throat choked on the cheer, as memory went back to the day when the Battalion said goodbye to Toronto and started out on the "Long, Long Trail," that for most of them had ended before they turned toward home; and stern reality interjected a picture of the forty graves or more across the sea for every one of the returning heroes.

And yet—and yet the memory of those first originals was glorified by those who followed, as did our Greys, to keep the colors flying and the "Old Moosehead" flaunted before the Beast,—glorified to the last supreme sacrifice.

And so they swung along the old familiar Toronto streets again—a handful of the originals and hundreds of later comers, but heroes all ; modestly they received the acclaims; smiles of amused tolerance were their answer to the huzzahs; and here and there by strange device young ladies had penetrated the column of fierce helmeted, armed warriors fresh from the relentless field of war. Truly, love laughs at gunsmiths.

A matter of minutes and it was over ; the salute was taken; the grey blue helmets of the C. M. R.'s had faded into the night, and Toronto's thousands surged homeward again.

Then, and not till then was it realized that nature herself had marvellously [illegible] these first conquering heroes, exact duplicate of the honored [illegible] the trench helmets—a mark of honor bestowed by la belle France.

These Northern Lights marched and counter marched in a cloudless sky, and diamond points of light broke through from the vagrant stars. At last the Northern Lights broke up their streaming banners and formed a luminous crown in the north, as though nature or God him self were crowning the victor and flaunting His clean banner in the heavens, a symbol of purity and a challenge to noble ideals.

Then faded the wonderful manifestation into the black void, and in the south eastern sky there rose a golden moon and through the night the countryside was bathed in its soft radiant peacefulness.

This was but the first; thousands are yet to come, thousands of conquering heroes, but the thrill of March 19, 1919, will never come again.

And then, when the last man steps onto Canadian soil there still will be thousands who have not come. Not come? No; they have come long, long ago; and they will live with Canada down through the ages ; they ARE Canada,—while the heroes we now acclaim are the spirit of today, and eight million throbbing hearts welcome them.
