Mr. T. A. Strain of Porcupine visited old friends here for a few days last week. Mr. Strain was a resident of Flesherton 35 years ago, and it is eighteen years since he last visited us. He built several of the business blocks in town and likes to come around every twenty years or so to see how his work is standing.

The joke is on a Flesherton business man. He went to the county town on business and left word with the hotel clerk to be called in time for the early train. Now there is a before-daylight train on the Grand Trunk and he was called in time for this and taken to the Grand Trunk station, where he boarded the train and did not discover his error until he was out around Hepworth somewhere. Getting off, he hired a conveyance to bring him to Owen Sound and another from there home. It is said the early bird catches the worm, but this bird of a traveller got something much more more indigestible, and his breakfast came late that day.

What Canadians Did

Sir Arthur Currie, commander of the Canadian Corps, has been telling Canadian audiences a few things which they are glad to hear in regard to Canada's part in forcing the issue during the last 100 days of the war. General Currie says that on August 1st, 1918, the War Council had decided that they would fight only one more battle, which was intended to free the Paris-Amiens railway and gain the Amiens defence line, and when this had been done the Allied forces would consolidate their positions, and wait until spring for the American army to get there in strength. Then the war would be pushed to a successful conslusion. But the attack on the Amiens line was so successful that it was decided to follow it up at once, and the result was the utter defeat of the German army Previous to the great hammer blows of General Foch, the Canadian army had held a 35 mile front, or one fifth of the entire British front, and during the last three months of the war the Canadian artillery fired 25 per cent. of all the ammunition fired by the entire British army. General Currie says, "our citizen army fought against the greatest military machine the world ever produced, yet in four years they never lost a gun ; in the last two years they never failed to take their objective, and there were some of the divisions which never allowed a hostile foot to enter their trenches." In the great Amiens drive the Canadians formed the spear head, and the first day they penetrated the German line to a depth of eight miles, the greatest penetration made by any army during the war. During the last hundred days of the war Canadians faced 47 different German divisions, or more than one quarter of the enemy forces on the western front. Evidently Canada has reason to be proud of her soldier sons, and the story of their heroic and successful struggle cannot fail to thrill Canadian hearts for a thousanu years to come.—Guardian
