For Good Poultry Range

Growing chicks which have access to good range develop into profitable producers of eggs and meat with lower feed costs. But the range must be free from contamination and such as to give abundant, young, succulent forage throughout the entire growing season. Naturally the crop grown for such a range must be adapted to the soil and climate of the particular area.

At the Dominion Experimental Farm, Brandon, alfalfa sown at about twelve pounds an acre has proved to be the best suited to supply forage for poultry. It begins growth early in the spring and if moved from time to time, gives succulent and highly nutritious forage throughout most of the summer. Even after long droughts, it quickly recovers when rain comes.

A three-year range rotation is used at the Farm, which allows a two-year idle period between each crop of chickens. This keeps the range area free from contamination by disease organisms and parasites. During the rest period the range is cultivated and fallowed for one year. In mid-summer of the fallow year, alfalfa, either with or without a nurse crop, is sown. This leaves one year for the alfalfa to become established before chicks are pastured on it, and if the growth is heavy during the first summer, a hay crop can be removed.

An acre of alfalfa range will accommodate 400-500 birds, and to ensure all being used, colony houses or range shelters should be moved about. Feeders and drinking troughs should be moved frequently to reduce the risk of contaminatioin of the ground around them.

If possible poultry range should be on a well-drained site which is relatively free from permanent shade. Temporary shade can be provided by cultivated plants, such as sunflowers or corn.
