A Faith That Needs A Public Platform

One of the strange happenings of our day is the way many people have been ready to accept, as something new and wonderful, a political system as old as our race. All our history is a record of recurring conflict between the individual and the encroachment of the State. At one time the State was represented a aboslute king. The barons at Westminster defied the King and recreated the power of the people in the first parliament. Then there was parliament falling under the influence of the monarch. and with it Cromwell's bold challenge reverberating down the years: "You have sat here too long for any good you have been doing. In the name of God, go!" Then came the Bill of Rights and Habeas Corpus and the Reform Bills, establishing the rights of the individual and bulwarking them against the power of the State. Now there are those who would ask us to retrace these steps, and would have us believe that they are offering something new and hopeful.

It is true that what they offer is made to appear new. It is festooned with catch-fancy frills and phrases, and tempting bait for the unwary. We are told that the State will p for us, will look after us run our affairs and spend our money for us, and in return will provide us with premiums, bonuses, bounties, guarantees and securities. Look back! How fat did the people grow in those by-gone years when the State was absolute and there were no individual liberties?

All progress of our world springs from the liberties we wrested fro authority. Now we are asked to accept, as the modern view, that we should give them all back. Look at the countries that still hold a large measure of these gains. Look how they stand out against the dark picture of that world that has accepted the dominance of the State with its benefits, in return for liberty. Look back and remember that the State was always autocratic, that even today it takes your resources to pay for the benefits it offers. But it asks, double, for it demands your liberties also.

What these days seem to need is a leadership that still believes, and is ready to live or die politically. for the concept that what we have fought for through our history is still our cause; that personal freedom and individual self-reliance and human dignity and human responsibilities mean more to us than temporary benefits that degrade us. Surely most of us still so believe. Surely it should be possible to find leadership that, forgetting expediency, has the courage to make a platform of that faith.

Nothing new! The Babylonians had real estate maps 4,200 years ..go.
