POETRY.

HER PROPER SPHERE.

I gaze on a familiar scene—
The dearest scene in human life—
Whose central figure is a queen—
The queen of home—the model wife.
Her willing subjects at her knee,
Beneath her sceptre's gentle sway,
First learn how sweet their slumbers be
Who tread the path of right all day.

Her throne exerts a greater power
Than all earth's potentates combined;
Beneath her care the perfect flower
Bursts from the budding youthful mind
And over all the world to-day
When wrong goes down before the right,
The mother's early lessons play
A silent part of wondrous might.

Ah, could we estimate the worth
Of mother's lesson, mother's prayer,
How much of all the good of earth
We'd owe to her untiring care.
For her there is no "higher sphere,"
She makes no battle for her "rights"—
Such topics fall upon her ear
As snow that melts where it alights.

I have no patience with the zeal
Of those reformers (?) who insist
That women's shoulders from the wheel
Of progress has too long been wissed.
As long as there are homes of peace,
Where children heed their mothers' prayers,
The woman's powers will never cease
To purify the world's affairs.

MARRYING FOR LOVE.

'Now mark what I say to you, Susy Barton. I can't have no more of this nonsense about Harry Grayworth. Nobody ever heered of him until he came hanging round last summer, calling himself an artist, and sketchin' every old pile o' stuns he came across. Abel Powers is worth a dozen on him; and I expect, when he comes to-night, you'll tell him you're very much obliged for his kind offer, and you'll try to make him a good wife. Either you promise Abel Powers this very night to marry him, and give up all this ridiculous nonsense about that other feller, or you leave my house quicker'n lightnin'!'

The Widow Smith's eyes sparkled, and the snuff colored ribbons on her cap quivered ominously.

Susy rose without a word, her cheek glowing, and deliberately walked out of the house, scarcely staying to tie her little sunbonnet under her chin.

'True as I live and breathe, she's gone!' exclaimed the widow, half relenting. 'I didn't calculate she'd fire up so quick! But let her go—I don't care. She'll be back soon enough.'

A short time afterward, Susy Barton sat on a fallen log in the woods, the sunbonnet pushed back from the glossy auburn hair, her tiny feet stirring the withered fern plumes below, and her blue, trusting eyes turned upon the face of a tall, slender young man, who stood beside her, his dark hair blown about by the sunset wind.

'This Abel Powers is a rich farmer, dearest, is he not?' asked the stranger.

Susy nodded, wonderingly.

'Then,' he pursued, 'I scarcely know why you choose, in preference, one like me, who only offers you his loving heart.'

'Because,' returned Susy, innocently, 'I love you.'

'And you are willing to share my lot, hard and comfortless as it may be—I do not say will be?'

'I would go with you to the world's end,' said Susy, earnestly, putting both her little palms in Henry Grayworth's outstretched hands.

And so she placed the seal upon her fate—for richer, for poorer—for better, for worse!

* * * * *

It was the evening before Christmas—cold and clear, with snow on the hills, and the woods all snapping and cracking in a sheath of ice. The Widow Smith, trudging along the road to Ellerton Hall, began to speculate rather uneasily as to whether she should reach her destination before dark. For she was carrying a famous recipe for Christmas pies to the housekeeper at Ellerton Hall.

'It's a fine place,' soliloquized the Widow smith, as she sat down to rest herself on a great boulder by the wayside, 'and only to think that Mr. Ellerton has lived away from it all his life! I don't see what folks find so dreffful nice in travelling about. I must say. However, Mrs. Peckham—clever old lady she is, and wears real handsome caps—she says he's coming home to-morrow with his young wife. It's a great thing to be born rich! I'd like to get a peep at Mrs. Ellerton—I wonder if she'll be at church Sunday! I do suppose she wears a silk gown every day of her life, and white embroidered skirts! Mrs. Peckham says they've been fittin' up the house wonderful fine for her!'

The widow was plodding on once more when there was a merry jingle of sleighbells in the road behind, and two fiery horses were checked close to her. A sweet face, set in a framework of auburn curls, leaned out of the window, and two eager hands were extended.

'Law sakes alive!' ejaculated the widow, 'it's Susy Barton. Child, where have you been all this time and where are you going now?'

'Jump in, aunty—I'm going to the Hall, and I've just come from your house, where the door was most hospitably locked!'

The widow had intended to play the role of relentless guardian, but she could not resist the infection of Susie's kiss and hug.

'Going to the Hall, eh! O, you've got a situation there—I suppose you're Mrs. Ellerton's lady's maid?'

'Well, yes,' laughed Susy: 'I do sometimes wait on Mrs. Ellerton.'

'Well, I'm glad you've got a tolerably respectable place, though you'd better have married Abel Powers—and why haven't you let me see you afore?'

'How could I, aunt? We only arrived at the Hall this morning, and I started for your house the first time I could slip away.'

''Got a pretty good situation?'

'Very!' said Susy.

'You'll find the housekeeper a dreadful nice lady,' said the widow, patronizingly. 'I'll speak a good word for you to her if you like.'

'Thank you!' said Susie, veiling her eyes beneath their long lashes.

'What sort of a person is Mrs. Ellerton?' pursued the widow. 'She must be easy tempered if she lets you go cuttin' around in this velvet cushioned sleigh, with a feller in a gold-banded hat to drive you!'

'O, she's very kind to me,' returned Susy.

'Is she pretty?'

'Well—I don't know—I can't say exactly,' hesitated Susie, slightly embarrassed.

The old lady was just turning around to demand an explanation, when the sleigh dashed up in front of the broad flight of marble steps that led to the portico of Ellerton Hall, and they descended.

Susie led the way through the arched vestibule into an elegant drawing room, where a clear fire burned on the marble hearth, and the purple velvet curtains swept to the very floor. The chandelier was already lighted, and the gold and amethystine tints of the frescoed ceiling seemed like a canopy of precious jewels to the Widow Smith's unaccustomed eyes.

'This ain't the housekeeper's room,' exclaimed the old lady, twitching her piece's dress in dismay. 'Spose Mrs. Ellerton should come in?'

The door beyond opened, and a tall, slender gentleman entered the room, with a bright, welcoming glance to Susy.

'Let me introduce my husband, aunt.'

'Why, bless me, its Henry Grayworth!' ejaculated the amazed Widow Smith, doubting the transmissive accuracy of the silver spectacles she had confided in for the last ten years.

'You have got the first two names right, Mrs. Smith,' said the gentleman, laughing; but my name happens to be Henry Grayworth Ellerton.'

'Are you Mrs. Ellerton?' exclaimed the widow, wheeling round, so as to face her niece once more.

'She is Mrs. Ellerton,' returned her husband, smiling. 'I wished to marry one who would love me for myself alone, not for my wealth or station; and so I came to the village as a poor young artist, under the name of Grayworth, and wooed and won this precious wife of mine. She never knew my real name until we stood side by side at the altar!

He passed his arm around Susy's waist and looked down upon her with affectionate pride, answered by the loving light in her own eyes.

The widow sat down and rubbed her spectacles vehemently.

'Its jest like the books I used to read when I was a gal! she exclaimed at last.

The widow did not know that truth is sometimes stranger than fiction.

HALTON COUNTY FAIR.

Very Successful.

The annual fall exhibition of Halton County Agricultural Society took place in Milton on Tuesday and Wednesday of last week. The displays of farm produce and domestic manufactures were equal in quantity to those at any former show held in the county. The exhibition of horses, competent judges state, was equal to that at the Provincial Exhibition. The total number of entries are considerably over two thousand. The Credit Valley railroad and Northern & North-Western railroads ran excursion trains, and it is estimated that over seven thousand people visited the grounds. The success of the show is greatly due to Mr. J. Brothers, the president, and the energetic secretary, Mr. W. C. Beaty, who has held that position for twenty-four years. The following is the
