The Young Folks.

SUCH A HAT!

'Tis torn and 'tis tattered,
'Tis bruised and 'tis battered,
'Tis ragged and limpsey and flabby and flat;
The roses are faded,
The feathers are jaded,
Did ever you see in your life such a hat?

Twould scarcely take leaves
To tell of the flowers,
The wreathing of daisies with bunches of green,
The dainty wee feather,
All helpin' together
To make it the cunningest hat ever seen.

But torn from its beauties
And thick of its duties,
Its thrilling adventures and sorry abuse;
For ever and ever
That rascally Rover
Has made it his plaything, to tear or to lose.

'Twas left in the garden—
Of course it was hard on
Those beautiful trimmings all out in the storm;
'Tis flung up for cherries,
'Tis pecked full of berries,
And Kitty has found it a nest snug and warm.

But look at the gleaming
And beaming and dancing
Of those bonny eyes peeping out from the crown;
The dark hair curling
And flowing and whirling
With crumpled old ribbons forlorn hanging down.

Yes, take them together
In all kinds of weather—
The cheek like the rose, the laughter so gay,
The dimples so merry—
'Tis surely the very
Best hat you have looked on for many a day.

WHAT HARRY MISSED.

There certainly was a mischievous sparkle in grandmother's eyes, as she added the last few words to a note she was writing, folded it up and put it in an envelope. In spite of her gray hair and feeble steps, grandmother enjoyed a little mischief now and then quite as well as any of her grandchildren.

"Harry," she said, going to the door and addressing a boy who was stretched luxuriously in a hammock swung across the shady porch, "will you take this note down to the apothecary's for me? I forgot to send it by Zed when he went to the store."

"O grandma!" and Harry's face wrinkled up into a perfect snarl of frowns. "Need I go now? It's so warm."

"You won't find it very warm riding on your bicycle on the shady side of the street," grandmother answered.

"Can't Zed go when he comes back? I'm just fixed so comfortably!"

"What's Zed wanted for?" asked a cheery voice, and the flushed, good-humored face of the chore-boy looked around the end of the porch. "Here's the basket of things, Mrs. Lindsay," he added, as he put down a well filled basket on the steps and wiped his perspiring face. "Did you want me for anything, ma'am?" he asked.

"I was asking Harry if he would not go down to the apothecary's for me, but he doesn't seem inclined," Mrs. Lindsay answered.

"I'll go for you," Zed offered promptly. "I'll cool off walking down."

"Well, Zed, I will let you go if you will be so kind," grandmother said after a moment's pause. "Be sure and do all the errand, Zed!" she called after him as he reached the gate.

"Yes'm," Zed answered, with a bewildered look on his round, freckled face. Didn't he always do all that he was told to? That caution sounded as if he had been remiss in something.

He understood it twenty minutes later, when, after the clerk had put up the package of spices, he stepped around behind the soda fountain, which Zed had been watching rather wistfully, thinking how refreshing a draught of cool soda would be, and wondering what "Ice Cream Soda" meant.

"What will you have, sir?" asked the clerk.

"Why, I don't want any soda!" stammered Zed. "That is, I'd like some well enough; but I haven't got any money."

"That's all right," answered the clerk. "The order in this letter is to give the bearer a glass of ice cream soda; so I suppose you won't object?"

A broad smile illumined Zed's face, as he remembered Mrs. Lindsay's injunction to do all the errand. She had meant this treat for him, since Harry had declined to do her errand. "Strawberry," he said, as promptly as if he had been used to ordering ice cream soda all the days of his life.

Wasn't it good, though that tall glass of sparkling soda, with that delicious ice-cold lump of strawberry cream floating in it? Zed breathed a sigh of perfect content as he sat down in his chair and leisurely dipped out the refreshing mixture with a dainty long handled spoon.

Zed was glad that the bowl of the spoon was so small, because then the cream would last so much longer.

When he went home, grandmother was sitting on the porch with her knitting, while Harry still rolled about in the hammock, having some pangs of conscience in regard to his disobligingness, though grandma uttered never a word of reproach.

"Here's your package, ma'am," Zed said, "and that ice-cream soda was prime; I'm ever so much obliged for it," and he beamed all over at the remembrance of his unexpected treat.

"What!" shouted Harry, sitting upright in the hammock. "Has Jenkins got his ice-cream soda in, and did Zed have some grandma?"

"Yes," grandma answered placidly, picking up a stitch in her knitting that Harry's exclamation had made her drop. "Part of my order was that the bearer should have some ice-cream-soda."

"Oh, why didn't you tell me?" groaned Harry. "I'd have gone in a minute, grandma, if I had known that."

"Yes. I have no doubt you would," grandma answered, tranquilly; "but I thought that the boy who was willing to do my errand for the sake of being obliging deserved the treat."

"Oh, to think what I missed!" Harry mourned as he fell back in the hammock, and I am afraid he regretted the lost ice-cream soda more than the fact that he had grumbled about doing an errand for dear patient grandmother, who was always devising pleasures for him.

After that, when he was inclined to grumble over an errand, he remembered what he had missed that day by his unwillingness, and went at once; but he never found ice-cream soda waiting for him at the end of his journey, as Zed did that afternoon.

That was something he had missed!
