Still and Owners Captured

Having received a tip that swamp whiskey was being manufactured on the premises of Steve Weingart, a bachelor farmer living about three miles west of town, says the Walkerton Herald and Times, License Inspector White, accompanied by Chief Ferguson, made a raid on the premises and found a portion of an up to date still, but not seeing Weingart they suspected that he had concealed himself on their approach and searching the home they found him hiding under the bed. On being discovered Weingart came out from under cover but would not give them any information as to the rest of the still. A search revealed the worm under some hay behind the barn and when assembled made one of the best moonshine manufacturing plants the officers had yet seen. In the barn was also discovered a 30 gallon barrel of mash covered over with hay. Weingart was arrested, also a man called "Frenchy," who was part owner of the plant. Each of the men was fined $400 and costs.
