An Amused Correspondent

Editor Advance: I was amused to read your lament in last week's issue that some unfortunate young man had been fined for drinking liquor in an illegal place, but had not known what he was drinking.

In the first place, our laws are made for observance and no breach should be condoned simply on sympathetic grounds. Is this not so? If there was liquor in an illegal place should not the illegality be subject to the penalties of the law?

As for the "innocent" young man (one can speak with frankness since his name is withheld) who drank a stray beverage out of a sealer, one wonders what he thought it was.

Seldom does one drink water out of a sealer just to find out what it is.

One might be excused for regretting that a newspaper should insinuate that a law-breaker is suffering persecution because of any set of circumstances so "thin" as though revealed by your news item of last week. One of our first duties as citizens is to observe the laws we have made. TORONTONIAN.

Owen Sound Couple Charged With Murder

"That Jamieson Johnston came to his death on September 5 at his home in the City of Owen Sound we believe through strychnine poisoning, and that the evidence points to Dan McMillan and his wife, Mary McMillan, as the persons implicated in the administration of the same."

Such was the verdict rendered by the Coroner's jury shortly after midnight in the inquest into Johnston's death which occurred on the night of Labor Day under circumstances which, on the surface, appeared innocent enough. The death certificate, issued by the Coroner after enquiry among the dead man's friends, gave tetanus following extraction of the teeth as the cause; but the statements of neighbors and, probably more than anything else, the marriage of his widow to Daniel McMillan within a week after death, caused the Crown Attorney to take the case in hand and order the exhumation of the body and the holding of an inquest.—Advertiser.

Shortly after the verdict was announced the man and woman were arrested and placed in jail to await their trial.
