Walked Derry Walls

different points of interest. We had the privilege of walking around the walls of Derry. The city at the time of the siege in 1688-9 was entirely within these walls though today the larger part of the city is outside the walls. The city was reached through four gateways. King James and his army endeavored to enter the city but the gates were shut against him. In consequence he beseiged the city some eight or nine months, and the people were well nigh reduced to starvation, when at last the good ship Mount Joy, loaded with provisions, broke the boom stretched across the river and thus relieved the city. King James had repeatedly asked the city to surrender and was each time informed that they would die rather than surrender their religious liberty. This same determination has continued throughout the centuries and today the Irish Loyalist will surrender no rights or liberties as long as breath of life remains in his body.

The writer was privileged to visit St. Columbus cathedral, situated inside the walled city. It was erected in 1633 and contains many of the old relics connected with the siege of Derry.

Due to the unsettled condition of the country there were some points of interest that we were unable to visit. It was rather interesting to be questioned and searched for arms during our travels, also interesting—in fact too much so at times — to hear the thunderings of artillery, the barking of machine guns, and the sharp crack of rifles, and also the rather nerve-racking experience of fleeing from a house in which we were visiting. At 11.30 p.m. one of our friends rushed into the house, advising that we flee at once as the enemy were but a short distance away and were coming our way. We surely lost no time in getting out, and, rushing across the fields, took refuge in a certain place and awaited events. Fortunately it turned out to be a false alarm and after spending a sleepless night we returned to our headquarters in the morning. This was the only real scare we received during our stay in Ireland.

As to the Irish people in general, they are the most kindly hearted people I have ever met. They certainly will spare no pains to entertain one and make him feel at home. Ireland, in proportion to her population, has probably contributed to the world a larger percentage of great men than that of any other country. The awful crimes that have and are being committed in Ireland at the present time are not with the approval of at least 95 per cent. of the Irish people, at least this is the writer's conclusion after a careful survey of the situation.

Now that the elections are over in the Irish Free State and the people have overwhelmingly approved of the Treaty with Great Britain, it is now up to Messrs. Griffith and Collins to clean up. And this they are endeavoring to do fairly. Thus they will surely welcome back the British to restore order. There are other phases of the Irish situation that I would like to discuss, but for various reasons will not do so at the present time.

Industrially speaking, Ireland is not as great a manufacturing nation as her neighbors, England and Scotland, although the city of Belfast, alone, has the proud distinction of being the home of the world's largest industrial shipbuilding yards, also the largest linen mills, the greatest rope manufacturing industry, and last, but not least, the greatest tobacco works. It is seldom, indeed, that one city has so many industries that are the greatest in the world. Dublin, the capital of the Free State, has also some manufacturing institutions, though not nearly so great as her sister city of the north.

The writer was much impressed with the twilight in Ireland During the month of June in the north of Ireland there is but some 2½ hours of real night. For hours after sunset one could read quite readily the smallest print of an ordinary book.

Ireland, in common with her neighbors, England and Scotland, is surely cursed with the liquor traffic Even the smallest villages have at least two or three liquor shops. The people generally are agreed that if there were prohibition in Ireland it would go a long way toward the solution of many of the vexed problems that are yet to be solved.

While there are many phases of Irish life that I have not detailed in this rather rambling epistle, yet, Mr. Editor, I feel that I have taken more space than you may have at your disposal. I trust, however, that your readers may find in it something of interest. I am yours very truly, an old Kimberley boy,
