PROSECUTION VS. PROSECUTION

A case recently occurred on the Guelph to Owen Sound highway that from this distance appears to be worthy of comment.

There is a suspicion that some of our laws are not tempered with justice, and that some of our law interpreters are emulating the demands of Shakespear's Shylock in exacting the pound of flesh. The young man referred to was driving a load of contraband liquor from Guelph to Owen Sound. He was caught and fined a thousand dollars. Until the amount could be raised he occupied a cell in the jail, and immediately upon securing his release by paying the fine he was again pounced upon by the authorities for furious driving while the police were after him, and fined another fifty dollars and costs—$1084.80 in all.

Extreme penalties such as this lay our officials open to the charge of fining for revenue, and not to prevent crime. Will such a penalty cause this young man to respect the law? Will it not rather cause him to despise authority while it handicaps him with a debt of large proportion with which to start life?

An ordinarry runner of contraband from a foreign country would not be treated so severely, and it appears to us that some provision should be made in a very severe law whereby a certain amount of leniency might be shown where found advisable. Of course we do not know the young man in question, and hold no brief for lawbreakers in any form, but we do feel that our laws in many cases are too severe and that the penalties exacted are apt to defeat aims for which they are purported to have been made.

Incidents similar to the above are to the point. We fine a man a thousand dollars for carrying a case of liquor on the public highway! For evading the duty on contraband goods we seize the merchandise and let the culprit go with a small fine or no fine atall. The law that makes this possible does not seem to us to be founded on justice. There should be a reasonable penalty in both cases, but it appears to us that there is a parallel between them and that as both are contraband both should be treated alike. But charity should also enter into the administration of justice and justice should be tempered with charity.
