THE ROAD TO HAPPINESS

This is the road to Happiness;
Start Now, from Where You Are;
"Turn to the Right, and keep straight on,"
And you'll not find it far.

Along the Path of Willing Feet
And over Heartease Hill,
Across the fields of Sweet Content,
The stream of Glad Good-will;
Then through the land of Loving Heart,
The gate that's called "To-day,"
And down the steps of Little Things
Into the Common Way.

And take the Cloak of Charity,
The staff of Wise Employ,
A loaf of Bread of Daily Grace,
A flask well-filled with Joy;
A word of cheer, a helping hand,
Home good to give or share,
A bit of song, a high resolve,
A hope, a smile, a prayer.

And in the Place of Duty Done,
Beside the Door of Home,
You'll find the House of Happiness—
For Happiness does not roam.
—Annie Johnson Flint.

Our Parents' Wishes

R. Ray Baker

"DO YOU think we were made for each other, Fred?"

Fred Hamilton's lip curled in scorn.

"Hardly. I have never thought so—except back in our school days, when I used to carry your books and share my jaw-breakers with you."

Eva Marlow adjusted a bouquet of roses in a vase on the table.

"Then why carry on this farce any longer? It's making us both miserable. We don't love each other; in fact, it's quite the reverse. For one thing, you're terribly selfish and there are other things about you that I do not like."

"Thanks for the compliment," he said dryly, rising from the chair in which he had been seated. "Perhaps I am selfish, but remember I am an only child. To be frank, I have much the same opinion of you."

She lifted the vase and inhaled the fragrance from the flowers.

"Thanks for the compliment," she mocked. "Perhaps I also am selfish, but remember, I too, am an only child. It's nice to have an understanding, isn't it? It appears to be mutually agreeable for us to disagree."

"Decidedly," he acquiesced. "It was foolish for us to become engaged in the first place."

"We wouldn't have," she reminded, "if it had not been for our parents. Just because they had all been friends they tried to settle our destiny for us. It was all right when we were children, but since we're grown old enough to reason for ourselves, it's different."

"You are right. We have been keeping the affair going simply because our parents wished it. It was not a question of love or money, because both of us are comfortably fixed, you with the money your father left you and I with my prospering business. I was simply honoring my parents' wish but if they were alive they would not insist on it, I am sure."

"As I feel the same way about it, we will call it quits then," said Eva, and that is what they did.

When Fred left the apartment occupied by Eva and her aunt he was not in the best spirits imaginable. It was not pleasant to be called selfish even by a girl he did not love. He leaped into his roadster and drove down town.

Selfish? Was he? Well, perhaps she was right. Come to think of it, he never had gone out of his way to lighten anyone's burden. Still it was not necessary for Eva to pick him to pieces that way.

Down through the congested streets he drove, unable to shake off a feeling he could not quite analyze. He was as glad to be free of Eva as she was to get rid of him, but that remark about selfishness rankled.

He had been driving abstractedly, when of a sudden a cry distracted him. A big touring car ahead had come quickly to a halt, but as abruptly it started off and disappeared. Jamming on the brakes, Fred managed to avoid striking a small, huddled human form on the street.

He looked with a feeling of curiosity for a moment. He did not think of mingling with the crowd that rushed from the curb and hovered about the huddled form. It was no concern of his, was his thought, until suddenly the trend of his recent recollection flashed back to his mind. "You're terribly selfish," were the words that echoed in his ears, and they prompted him to leave the car and join the group.

A man held the limp form in his arms. Fred recognized the pale face as that of a diminutive newsboy familiar to this busy corner.

"Poor kid," said the man. "That big car hit him and hurried away. What had I better do with him?"

"Take him to Doctor Wilson's office across the street," Fred directed. "I'll be there as soon as I park my car."

When Fred entered the office the boy was lying on a lounge, looking about with wide, timorous, inquiring eyes.

"He ought to be taken home at once," said the doctor.

The boy looked up wildly.

"No—no!" he exclaimed in a plaintive little voice. "I can't go. I have not sold my papers—my papers! Where are they?"

"That's all right," said Fred. "Come on with me and I'll take you home. I have the money for your papers right here. You see, I—I sold them for you."

The lad lived with his father in a hovel in the worst part of the city. The father was an invalid, and it was necessary for Little Jim, as he affectionately called his son, to get out and earn their living. The invalid was a kindly old man, who regretted that the boy could not attend school, but "what are we to do?" he asked.

The plight of Little Jim played upon some hitherto unused heartstrings in Fred's breast.

"You will sell no more papers," he said. "You will go to school."

But Little Jim and his father were proud.

"We cannot permit it," said the invalid. "You may help us some if you wish, but we cannot let anybody support us fully."

Fred visited them twice a week, bringing them food, for they would not accept money, and Little Jim won his way into the young man's heart.

"You are very good to us," said the father on one occasion, "and there are other people who are good to us, too."

"And I like you best of anybody in the world," Little Jim told Fred, "except daddy and one other."

Came a day when Fred called to find Little Jim in tears. His father had suffered another stroke and a doctor was busy about the sickbed.

"Don't leave me, daddy," wailed the youngster, throwing himself on his knees beside the bed. "Please don't go."

The sick man smiled sadly and raised his eyes appealingly to Fred. Then he uttered a deep sigh and lay back, closing his eyes. Little Jim's father had gone to a place where there are no invalids; and Fred understood that last mute appeal.

A little later Fred took the orphan in his arms and carried him away.

"Where are we going?" sobbed Little Jim as they started down the rickety stairs in the dimly lighted hall-way.

"You are going home with me," said Fred gently, choking back a sob of his own. "I am going to be your daddy now."

The door at the foot of the stairs opened and a young lady started up the flight. Fred stepped aside with his burden to let her pass, but she came to a stop.

"What has happened?" inquired the voice of Eva Marlow. "And where are you taking my Little Jim? Why, it's—is that you, Fred?"

"It is," he said calmly, but somewhat aggressively, "and I'm taking him home because his father is dead. And what do you mean by 'my little Jim?'"

She appeared indignant.

"Why, I've been coming to see these people for some time. It started by your calling me selfish. That very day I came into this district to see if I could discover a way to become unselfish, and I found Little Jim and his father. I love the little fellow, and I am going to take him home with me."

"Not much you aren't," Fred said firmly. "I am going to be his father."

"You are wrong," she declared firmly. "I am going to be his mother."

Little Jim smiled through his tears.

"It will be nice," he said softly, "to have two nice people like you for my father and mother. It makes me almost happy."

He reached out with one arm and it encircled the girl's neck, while the other clug to Fred. It brought the two very close together.

First they looked at Little Jim, and then they gazed foolishly into each other's eyes, and slowly a smile crept across their countenances, a smile that seemed to light up the hallway as though the sun finally had succeeded in forcing an entrance.

"Eva," said Fred, clearing his throat, "I don't believe I dislike you after all. You are not selfish, and—and after all, our parents' wishes—"

"Yes," she agreed, "our parents' wishes—"

ANXIOUS TO PLEASE

At breakfast in one of the hotels an exceedingly fidgety and irritable person within two minutes of giving his order began to squirm and demand when he was going to get his food.

"Waiter," he demanded, for about the fourth time, "where's my chop."

"It's on the grill, sir," the waiter responded. "Will you have it now, or wait until it's done?"
