Boys Not Learning Trades

The period of industrial prosperity now opening up is likely to find a shortage of skilled mechanics, according to Clark Reilly, secretary of the Canadian Association of Building and Construction Industries, and the subject is to be given some discussion at the Association's convention in Toronto this week. The prospective shortage is not blamed wholly on the migration of many skilled mechanics to the United States, but is due, rather, Mr. Reilly says, to the refusal of boys to learn a trade. Opportunities to immediately obtain adult pay for unskilled labor has blinded many boys to future possibilities. The old system of aprenticeship, under which the youth was bound by his indentures to stay on a job long enough to learn a trade, had its merits.

A word of praise for the special agricultural enquiry committee came on Thursday of last week, in the Ontario Legislature, from A. P. Mewhinney, (Lib. West Bruce). "I think the Committee has done good work," he said. "I believe the choice of the chairman was a wise one, for I think no man knows the conditions of agriculture better than Hon. Dr. Jamieson, and I believe the farmers will reap benefit from the recommendations made by the committee."
