NORTH POLE CONQUERED

At last the North Pole has been conquered by man, not by the old method of dog train and packs, but by a dirigible, the modern method of travel. For years various expeditions have set out to discover the North Pole and tremendous sums have been sunk by adventurous explorers who endeavored to gain glory with their discoveries. The frozen north has always been a barrier for exploration parties as tremendous obstacles had to be overcome in the many attemps. No doubt the far north will be forever impervious to the overland route to the pole by explorers. Formerly it took many months to make a few hundred miles, but now the Pole has been conquered within forty-eight hours from the time the expedition set forth from Spitzbergen, Norway, with Captain Raold Amunsden, famous Arctic explorer, as leader. The reports from the members of the expedition show that there was no land discovered around the North Pole, but ice and open water was found and rocks discerned. Now that the trip has been made over the Pole it is likely that interest will somewhat wane with respect to that goal since the momentous journey by Captain Amunsden and his gallant staff, which has connected the continents of Europe and North America by the Pole route.

EDITORIAL NOTES

It is up to explorers now to discover the South Pole and explore that vast territory surrounding it—about two million square miles in extent.
