Phoney charity may benefit just promoter

Sometimes it's awfully hard to say no. The caller is smooth and convincing. The product has a one-year guarantee and yes, it does cost a bit more than usual, but then, it's for a good cause.

What's a buck or two, after all, you're helping to send an underprivileged child to camp.

Thousands of Ontario residents are subjected to pitches like this every year. Sometimes the money they donate lines the pockets of unethical promoters instead of helping those in need.

If you donate money to charity, make sure you know who you are dealing with and where the money is going.

There are as many variations on the phoney charity game as there are unscrupulous fund raisers. But a few common schemes show up with unfailing regularity.

Sharp operators have often used well-respected community groups as a front to sell tickets for circuses.

The group allows its name to be used in return for a portion of the proceeds, which may be as little as 10 per cent, while the rest goes to the promoter.

Of course, the well-meaning community group is unaware that the lion's share of the take goes to the promoter, and that highpressure sales tactics may be used.

Ticket sales are often handled by telephone solictors working out of what have come to be known as "boiler room" operations.

By saying they represent non-profit charitable groups, the telephone solicitors, either students working for a low hourly wage or fast-talking professionals on commission, are able to raise huge amounts.

If you do buy a ticket or make a donation, your name and the amount given may be written on a "tap" card and the calls from telephone solictors may continue.

Tap cards will often be sold to other organizations asking for donations.

Other phony charity groups canvass door-to-door, in shopping centres, or on the street, selling everything from chocolate bars to lightbulbs.

Of course, many legitimate charity organizations sell similar products and because of this, it is often difficult to distinguish between canvassers representing non-profit charities and those selling for profit-making ventures.

A cautious donor is the best defence against unethical fund raisers. By following a few simple guidelines, you should be able to avoid being taken for a phony charity ride.

Know who you are dealing with. Give only to established charities with which you are familiar.

Ask questions. Find out where the money is going and what percentage is actually used for charity work. How much money is the group trying to raise?

Ask the canvasser for his or her name, address and telephone number.

Check an organization's reputation and name with the Better Business Bureau which maintains files on most of these groups, and with the Chamber of Commerce.

If you're not sure about the organization, insist on receiving an audited financial statement for the previous year.

Be suspicious of any organization that admits a large portion of the money collected goes for operating costs.

Because few legitimate charities solicit donations by telephone, extra caution is advised in these dealings. If it appears to be a "boiler room" operation, don't commit yourself.

Ask the telephone solicitor to put the request in writing, so you can have time to think it over and have a record of it.

Ask how your name or phone number were obtained, and get the telephone solicitor's name and address.

The Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations can provide information on phony charity schemes, as well as on The Business Practices Act that deals with false or misleading representations, through its Consumer Information Centre at 555 Yonge Street, Toronto M7A 2H6.

Consider donations carefully, and don't be afraid to ask questions.
