THE PRINCE'S BALL.
Fancy Dress Party at Marlborough House.
London Times, July 23.
The fancy dress ball given last night by their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales was not only magnificent beyond the usual magnificence of such festivals, but was planned and carried out down to the smallest details in such a thorough and artistic manner that some account of it cannot fail to be interesting. In years gone by Buckingham Palace was famous for its fancy balls, and several fetes given by Her Majesty and the late Prince Consort will probably long remain unqualled as splendid revivals of the pageantry of historic characters and costumes. One, if not more, of Her Majesty's fancy balls has been recorded in costly folio, handing down the various splendors of a single evening to the envy and admiration of all future ballgivers. It would be a pity if some attempt were not also made to preserve the principal costumes of last night, for many of them were finely pictorial and were only achieved by dint of much pains and exact knowledge and good taste on the part of those who arranged them. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales took a most active part in the preparations and called to its aid a committee, the most indefatigable members of which were Mr. Frederick Leighton, R. A., and Mr. Augustus Lumley.

The dancing was in three rooms on the garden front of the ground floor, the ball-room for the chief quadrilles, and the library and dining-room on either side. The Hungarian band played in the conservatory off the saloon, and Coote & Tinney's in the dining-room. Fancy dress was worn by every gent with, we believe, the sole exception of the Duke of Cambridge, who came in the uniform of a Field-Marshal. Coote and Tinney's musicians wore state coats, and all the servants their full liveries. There was not, except the Duke of Cambridge, a uniform or court dress in the brilliant crowd; all belonged to the past, though it should be said that Mr. Disraeli, who had been dining in the city appeared in his laced coat. The guests began to arrive early, the ladies and gentlemen of the set quadrilles coming in a little after the rest of the company. By 10:30, the hour named on the cards, the rooms were thronged with a crowd of which the usual epithet of 'brilliant' conveys but a feeble idea. There was the Duke of Wellington as Oliveraz, the Spanish Minister of Philip IV., wearing the collar and jewel of the Golden Fleece; the Duchess of Wellington as a donna of high degree. His Grace would have delighted the hearts of the tenants of his Peninsular estates; the Duchess walked the easy winner of all admiration, both home and foreign, and the splendid diamonds which strewed her dress delighted the eye. The Duchess of Marlborough had copied the famous Blenheim picture of Reuben's wife, and was all in black satin and lavender, a long veil flowing from her tufted Spanish head dress. Lord Mayo, as an incroyable in blue satin, with chin buried in neck cloth and pink collar, and a short waisted, long tailed coat, was a great success. Lord Hardwicke, as Queen Elizabeth's master of the Buckhounds, was a triumph of Tudor splendor, and there were officers who had gone back seventy or a hundred years in the history of their regiments. Conspicuous among these were Colonel Reilly, in the old dress of the Royal Artillery, and Colonel Charles Fraser, as an Eleventh Hussar officer under George III. Lord Marcus and Charles Beresford wore the jester's cap and bells, and a strange creature—discovered afterwards to be Mr. Bernal Osborne—appeared as one of the Italian zacconi, or mutes who follow at funerals. In his monk's dress and cord about his waist, and with a white linen bag, with holes for the eyes and mouth, over his head, he stood always the centre of a circle, one or another of whom he would now and then seize by the arm like the Ancient Mariner, speaking words of wisdom. Lord Shannon came as a simple Paddy, with a shillelagh, and there were all the usual dresses of a fancy ball—Mexicans, Albanians, &c. Musurus Pasha was a splendid Turk in ruby velvet overlaid with gold, Lady Hardwick's dress of black velvet, a large black hat looped up with feathers and velvet diamonds, which blazed all over the dress, was admired as much as any at the ball.

But all waited for the dinning room doors to open, and for the royal procession of the dancers at the six set quadrilles. At last the moment arrived; the Hungarians struck up the polonaise, and the procession entered, headed by Lord Colville, dressed after a picture at Penshurst of one of Queen Elizabeth's chamberlains. White wand in hand he marshalled the way, followed by an advance guard of six guardsmen in the laced coats and powdered heads of 1745. Then came the young Princes Albert, Victor and George as pages of honor, in white satin and gold dresses, taken from National Gallery pictures. Next entered her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, at the head of her Venetian quadrille, and led by her partner, Lord Hartington. Her Royal Highness wore a ruby coloured Venetian dress, with a blue front to the skirt, sewn with jewels and gold embroidery. The close sleeves were of ruby velvet, with blue satin puffings, gold embroidered; the small ruff was edged with gold, and the body of the dress covered with strings of pearls, but the most charming and becoming part of this magnificent costume was the small, close velvet cap, laced and covered with jewels of marvellous splendor. Her Royal Highness has not much to gain from dress, and, indeed, the ladies generally were much less beholden to their antique costumes than the gentlemen, for latter day millinery is not so bad, whereas latter day tailoring is poor work compared with Stuart and Georgian wardrobes. The Princess of Wales was followed by the other couples of the Venetian quadrille, first among them, walking with Lord Dunmore, the Duchess of Teck, whose Italian costume of white and gold blazed with diamonds. Prince Christian was a Venetian General, with a steel gold inlaid cuirass, bearing the arms of the republic, clasped over a brown velvet doublet, trunk-hose of velvet, deep ending to buff boots. The Prince wore steel gauntlets, an orange scarf, and a blue ribbon and badge. His Royal Highness' dress was thoroughly correct, and he led his partner, Lady Somers, who was magnificent as a Venetian lady. We will not name now the other members of this historic and artistic Venetian quadrille, for the procession must not wait except for royalty. It passes on its stately way, the velvet or steel-clad cavaliers leading the loveliest ladies in England, the beauty of each set off in a new light by the different splendor of fashions long since dead. Sleeves close and flowing, jewelled bodices, and feathered hats, shapes and colors familiar to us on Veronese's and Titian's canvases pass by, and then enters His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales at the head of a gay and gallant following, and leading the Duchess of Sutherland by the hand held high in polonaise fashion, which is followed, of course, by all. This was the Prince's own Vandyke quadrille, and His Royal Highness wore a Vandyke costume, which probably would set off most people to advantage, but which certainly seemed to suit its present wearer to perfection. The doublet and cloak were of light maroon satin embroidered in gold, the large black felt hat (all hats were worn) had a white feather, and the dress was completed with loose buff boots, steel spurs, and a long sword. On the left shoulder of the cloak was a large diamond star, and the Prince wore his badge of the Garter hanging from a blue riband round his neck. Fair cavalier curls flowing down his shoulders somewhat disguised His Royal Highness, but were the finishing touch to a very splendid and perfect costume. The Duchess of Sutherland wore a Henrietta Maria dress of white satin, the body hung with countless strings of fine pearls, great diamonds about her hair, which was done in the fashion of a Windsor picture of the Stuart Queen. In the procession of this Vandkye quadrille walked the Duke of Teck, all in blue-black satin, after a Stuart portrait of Montagu House. The Duke of Abercorn was for once in his life an unfortunate Lord Lieutenant, being the very fac-simile of the Strafford whom Land blesses in the picture with hands through the prison bars. The Duke of Teck led Lady Shrewsbury, the Duke of Abercorn's partner being Lady Listowel. We shall have more to say of these Vandykes costumes when we come to the dancing, but we must let the procession pass, till we come to fancies still as charming, but more airy and frolicsome. Princess Christian entering as Queen of Clubs, on the other hand of the Duke of Athole as King of Spades, is followed by the other cards of her quadrille pack. Her Royal Highness wears a fine close fitting silvery dress, with a Marguerite body, from which flow long sleeves bearing clubs stamped in black velvet, and her head-dress is of diamond stars. The second pack of cards is headed by Princess Louise as Queen of Hearts wearing dark blue velvet, white silver flowing sleeves, hearts in red on the dress, and a diadem of pearls and diamonds. Each princess wears a jewelled belt over the left shoulder, and Lord Claude Hamilton, as the King of Spades, is Princess Louise's partner. These and their troop passed, following the procession through ball room and library, to return to the ball room by the saloon for the opening of the ball with the Vandyke and Venetian quadrilles. The packs of cards were followed the Duke of Connaught, heading the Fairy Quadrille with Miss Graham, in the characters of Beauty and the Beast. His Royal Highness was a fairy prince in ruby velvet doublet and gray satin "tights," and ruby shoe, wearing a leopard's head and skin with gold claws attached to his shoulder by large diamond stars. This skin was left out later in the evening, and the duke appeared all in ruby velvet, with a small cap and white feather. The Duke was followed by Prince Gair Star and the Princess Cheri, the Goose Girl and the King, the White Cat, and others of whom more anon; and then came the Puritans in simple grey satin, with white collars and white stiff caps, dangerously but most picturesquely mated with cavalier officers of the Blues and Life Guards, in the uniforms of their regiments under Charles II. The process was closed by a rear guard of six guardsmen in their George II. uniforms.

The Venetian and Vandyke quadrilles having formed in the ball-room, the dancing began. In the Venetian Quadrille, as has been said, the Princess of Wales danced with Lord Hartington, who wore a doublet and trunk hose of lavender gray, embroidered with black and gold, having a large medallion head of Henry VIII., given to one of the Devonshire family by that King, on his breast. The other couples of this quadrille were the Duchess of Teck and Lord Tunmore, who stood beside the Princess of Wales; Marquis d'Azeglio and Duchess of San Tedore, Lady Aylesford and Lieutenant-Colonel Loyd Lindsay, Mr. Augustus Lumley and Lady Craven, Don Jose d'Argais and Mme. Murietta, Mrs. Forbes and Mr. Valentine Prinsen, Lady Archibald Campbell and Lord Aylesford, Lady Henry Somerset and Mr. C. Wood, Mrs. Maxse and Mr. Frederick Leighton. These danced at the sides, Prince Christian and Lady Somers, Lord Cowper and the Duchess of Manchester standing vis-a-vis to the Princess of Wales and the Duchess of Teck. In the Vandyke quadrille the Prince of Wales and the Duchess of Sutherland, the Duke of Teck and Lady Shrewsbury, stood at the library end of the ballroom, having opposite to them the Duke of Abercorn and Lady Bath, Lord Valentia and Lady Listowel. The sides were formed by Lieut. Col. Edgecombe and Lady Hermione Graham, Mr. Montague Guest and the Duchess of Leeds, Mr. A. B. Mitford and Lady Cornelia Guest, Mr. Chapin and Mrs. Sassoon, standing opposite to Lady Cowper and Sir Ivor Guest, Lady Granville and Lord Pembroke, Mrs. Stevenson and Lord Folkestone, Lady Hardwicke (most beautifully dressed) and Lord Caltborpe, Lord Dunmore (these are the Borgia-looking dresses of the Venetian quadrille) wore white satin and gold, with a surtout of blue velvet and sable, covered with magnificent pearls. The Marquis d'Azeglio was a Venetian noble from a Pitti Palace picture in a superb dress of white satin, embossed with a close pattern of black velvet. Don Jose D'Argais was in a beautifully made suit of black satin and embroidered with gold fleur de lis, and wore it not as a costume, but as though he were to the manner born. Lady Paget, though not dancing in this quadrille, wore a Venetian dress, being very accurately arrayed in scarlet, after a celebrated painting in the Borghese Gallery; and Lady Craven was a true La Belle di Tiziano. The Duchess of Manchester wore white and gold, with olive green gold embroidered sleeves, and altogether this superb Venetian quadrille may be best described as a most successful reproduction of Titian and Veronese types of the early sixteenth century.

In the Vandyke quadrille the Prince of Wales wore his buff boots and plumed hat in true cavalier style. Lady Cornelia Guest was arrayed after a celebrated Vandyke in the Borgniota Palace in Genoa, and wore a long stomacher completely covered with jewels. Her hair was plated in with pearls, and part of her head dress was a gigantic ruby, said to be the largest in the world. Lord Valentia's Vandyke cuirass, buff boots and leather jerkin embroidered in silver, were after a picture at Montagus House. The Duchess of San Teodore (Venetian quadrille) was all in blue and gold, as Queen of Cyprus. Lady Granville's Vandyke dress of blue satin, with a ruff and a large black Reubens hat turned up
